PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SEVENTIETH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Eternal God, who alone makest men to be of one mind in a house, enrich and purify our lives and make us humble, brave, and loving, that through us, by the power of Thy spirit, Thou mayest show forth Thyself to other men. Deliver us, we pray Thee, from lack of reverence for truth and beauty, from artificiality of life, from all that is unreal and insincere, and especially from cynicism toward our brethren, made in the image of God, that with love recovered in her midst America may teach all men to love one another and all nations to dwell together in happiness and friendship, to Thy honor and glory. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, March 6, 1928, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, communicated to the Senate the resolutions of the House adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. A. E. B. STEPHENS, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2317) continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927 disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WHITE of Maine, Mr. LEHLBACH, Mr. FREE, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. BLAND were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

SUNNY BROOK DISTILLERY CO.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1763) for the relief of the Sunny Brook Distillery Co.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will it lead to debate?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I think not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$1.65" and insert in lieu thereof "$2.20," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, pursuant to the provisions of section 3220, Revised Statutes, as amended, allow the claim of the Sunny Brook Distillery Co., of Louisville, Ky., for the refund of taxes paid in excess of $2.20 per proof-gallon on the distilled spirits not exceeding 7,635 gallons produced by the Associated Distilleries of Kentucky, a corporation now dissolved, which was a subsidiary of and entirely owned and controlled by said Sunny Brook Distillery Co., which spirits were removed to the plant of the Sunny Brook Distillery Co. and are now owned by it and contained in its concentration warehouse; but no refund shall be allowed unless such spirits are contained in regularly stamped bottles and cases in which they were placed when bottled in bond: Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may direct that any spirits on which refund of tax is paid under this act shall be removed to and stored in a warehouse designated by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF THE NEAR EAST RELIEF (S. DOC. NO. 70)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the general secretary of the Near East Relief (Inc.), submitting, pursuant to law, the report of the corporation for the year ended December 31, 1927.

Mr. CAPPER. In accordance with the usual practice, I ask that the report be printed with an illustration as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present a telegram in the nature of a petition from John H. Wallace, commander Department of Massachusetts, Veterans of Foreign Wars, relative to the unfinished business of the Senate, being the bill (S. 777) for the retirement of emergency Army officers of the World War, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., March 13, 1928.

DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.:

The Department of Massachusetts, Veterans of Foreign Wars, request you to please use your influence in procuring passage of emergency officers' retirement bill now before Senate.

JOHN H. WALLACE, Commander.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present a communication from the Swedish Charitable Society of Greater Boston, Mass., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To Massachusetts Representatives in the Senate, Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

The officers of the Swedish Charitable Society of Greater Boston, representing over 25,000 Swedish Americans, a large number of your constituents, have been delegated to advise you of their attitude toward the proposed reduction in immigration quotas whereby Sweden's quota will be reduced from 9,561 to 3,399. The matter was placed before the various delegates who were present at the annual meeting of this society.

Although we understand that these new figures are not based on the merits or demerits of any particular nationality, we wish to express our sincere disappointment in the unjust reduction of over 60 per cent of Sweden's annual quota.

The Swedes who have migrated to the United States have proven themselves worthy Americans and we hope, most sincerely, that some other more fair computation may be applied to settle America's immigration problem.

Respectfully,

THE SWEDISH CHARITABLE SOCIETY OF GREATER BOSTON,
G. ADOLF E. WESSMAN, President.
ERIC NORLING, Secretary.

LULU CHAPLIN

Mr. STEPHENS. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 374) for the relief of Lulu Chaplin, and I submit a report (No. 538) thereon.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. It is a private bill and it comes before us on a unanimous report from the Committee on Claims.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Let it go to the calendar.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will not object. A young man was killed by a soldier on guard at Columbia, S. C., and the soldier was convicted by a military court-martial and sentenced to three years in the penitentiary. The mother of the dead boy is an aged woman and is in need. This is merely one of the many formal bills which we pass here and it will give this old lady something in her old age for the death of her boy. The military court-martial convicted the man of the offense.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The amendment of the Committee on Claims was, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$25,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,500 to Lulu Chaplin, in full for all claims she may have against the Government on account of the death of William S. Chaplin, deceased, son of said Lulu Chaplin, who was wrongfully shot and killed by a soldier of the United States Army, on the 19th day of January, 1920, in Richland County, S. C., the said soldier of the United States Army being then and there engaged in the performance of his official duties, and the said William S. Chaplin not being then and there resisting the enforcement of any law, nor engaged in the perpetration of any unlawful act, nor violating any rules or regulations or orders or discipline of any military authority, he being a civilian and in the peaceful pursuit of his personal affairs when killed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

"Provided further, That out of the money hereby or heretofore appropriated no payment for any animal condemned for slaughter shall exceed the amount paid or to be paid by the State, Territory, county, and municipality where the animal shall be condemned, nor shall any payment be made therefrom for any animal so condemned if the value of such animal is fixed by any arbitrary maximum, or is not arrived at by some well recognized and equitable method of appraisal, and which method shall provide that in making such appraisal the fact that the animal has been condemned for disease shall not be considered. No payment shall be made unless the owner has complied with all lawful quarantine regulations."

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take up at this time for disposition the motion of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] for a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming wishes to proceed now, I will wait until he has finished.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to, and that question is now before the Senate. I shall ask the Senate not to vote to reconsider. The independent offices appropriation bill itself was duly considered, finally acted upon by the Senate, and then sent to conference. The conferees had several meetings in order to reach, if possible, a complete agreement. It will be remembered that certain amendments were offered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] which had not been introduced in order, which had not been sent to a committee, which had not been reported from any committee, and therefore the conferees on the part of the Senate were not in a position to insist on those amendments to the extent of further blocking a final agreement with the House after several joint meetings with the House conferees. One of the amendments submitted by the Senator from Alabama was practically agreed to by the conferees, while the other two were disagreed to.

There are certain well-known principles governing conference committees. I do not wish to repeat them, but perhaps there may be some in the Senate who do not understand them. First, although an amendment may have to do with a matter never considered by the House, never before the House for consideration, and never before a Senate committee, yet, if it is offered on the floor and is attached to the bill, when it goes to conference the Senate conferees are true to that amendment, whether it was or was not in order, if it had been ruled in order, or the chairman of the committee had consented, that the amendment might go on the bill to be considered in conference. The conferees on the part of the Senate take the same ground in defending such an amendment—and if they should not do so, they would be unworthy to be conferees—that they would take if the amendment had been advocated and proposed by them or by the committee, because the Senate has instructed them to stand by the conclusions reached by the Senate. However. there comes a time, if we are to have legislation, particularly with reference to appropriation bills, when there must be an agreement between the two Houses.

The rule, which is as old as this Capitol Building, is that if an amendment is not really in order in the House where it was attached to the bill and the other House has had no notice of it, the body incorporating it in the bill must in the long run, in the face of opposition on the part of the other body, give way, or we shall have no legislation. It is a matter of compromise.

In this instance the conferees insisted again and again, but, in what I think was the third meeting, after a couple of weeks, we were compelled to yield in the manner that we have reported. Thereupon, the conference report was presented to the Senate, its adoption was moved, and that motion was carried. Unfortunately, the Senator from Alabama was not present and very properly, no doubt, has asked for reconsideration. I do not believe that reconsideration will enable us to get what he desires. The amendments I believe are not of such a character. being more or less personal and not of a general nature, that the Senate conferees could indefinitely insist upon them. Therefore, I hope the Senate will vote "no" upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I should like to ask the Senator a question in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry with reference to the procedure. I understand that when the report of a conference committee is brought back and finally acted upon, the conferees, so far as the particular measure is concerned, are dismissed. Now, suppose we reconsider the vote by which the conference report on this appropriation bill was agreed to, is it contemplated that it be sent back to conference?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the inquiry of the Senator is entirely pertinent. If the vote upon the pending motion shall be in the negative, that will settle the matter; but if the motion to reconsider should be agreed to, then a new conference may be asked for and conferees appointed by the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Do I understand that the point of difference is an amendment that, if offered in the House, would have been subject to a point of order?

Mr. WARREN. The amendments which were adopted in the Senate were not presented nor considered in the House at all; they were never printed, so far as I know, and were never considered by the Senate committee.

Mr. FESS. The House conferees can not agree to those amendments unless they shall be taken back to the House and voted upon by that body?

Mr. WARREN. The House conferees were not willing to take them to the House.

Mr. FESS. Is there any power in the Senate to compel the conferees on the part of the House to take a disputed amendment back to the House for a vote?

Mr. WARREN. There is not, unfortunately.

Mr. FESS. That is the situation I am asking about. It seems to me that we are in a quagmire.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the conferees on the part of the House may agree as a matter of their own choosing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the Senate by an overwhelming vote attached two amendments to the independent offices appropriation bill. One of those amendments provided that no lawyer for the Shipping Board should receive a greater compensation than $10,000 a year. The other amendment cut the appropriation for the employment of lawyers down to approximately $115,000. The facts were represented to the Senate from a report made by the Shipping Board itself as to the amount of business that had been transacted and the number of lawyers who had been employed to perform the work. Both of those amendments were adopted by the Senate. When the bill went to conference a concession was made which, according to my judgment, struck out every provision of those amendments. A reported agreement with reference to one of those amendments indicates upon its face that something was conceded, when, as a matter of fact, from the information obtained by me from the Shipping Board, nothing whatever was conceded.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator is misinformed as to that. The Senator will remember that one of the amendments provided that no attorney for the Shipping Board should receive more than $10,000 a year. Our information was that none of the lawyers of the Shipping Board, except one, receives over $10,000 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. The advantage of the amendment to which the Senate agreed and to which the Senator refers is this: The bill as it passed the House provided for three officers of the Shipping Board at not to exceed $15,000 each. The Senate struck out "three" and inserted "two" who should receive not more than $15,000 each, and one who should receive not more than $12,000. As it passed the Senate the salaries of two attorneys could have been up to $15,000. The Senator from Wyoming is perfectly right in saying that two are not being paid that much now, but under the bill as reported to the Senate two could have been paid at that rate, while under the amendment adopted by the conferees only one of the attorneys can receive in excess of $10,000. That is the change that has been made.

Mr. BLACK. That is a change without a difference in effect for this reason.

Mr. SMOOT. It will have immediate effect, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. It is a change, as I think I can show, without any possible effect at any time for this reason: The provision to which I refer is that not more than three employees shall receive in excess of $10,000 a year.

Two of those employees who receive more than $10,000 a year are not lawyers. One of them is an engineer, and the other, as I understand, is in charge of the operation of boats. One of the employees is a lawyer. So the great concession which was made by the House is this, according to the report, that there is not now more than one lawyer to whom there is paid a salary of more than $10,000 a year; and now the concession is that hereafter there shall be only one lawyer who may be paid more than $10,000 a year. If there is any concession in that, I fail to see any possibility of it. It is a change of words which might mislead if one did not look into the facts, but is not a change of legal effect in any way whatever. So this purported concession is a concession on paper, but not a concession in fact.

The other proposition was that the Shipping Board should be limited to $115,000 for the payment of lawyers. I pointed out to the Senate when this body overwhelmingly voted that the lawyers were getting too much, that, according to the report of the Shipping Board, they had approximately 47 lawyers drawing something like $300,000 a year, to do practically no work, or work which one firm of lawyers could well handle, according to the information given to me by persons high in the Department of Justice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The debate on the amendments indicated that during the last year a very few lawsuits were tried, the greater number of those that were tried were dismissed, and a comparatively small number were compromised. Unquestionably this appropriation is being used as a means to provide comfortable and profitable places for partisan attorneys, who render very little service to the Shipping Board or to the Government.

With the indulgence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], I desire to say that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] seems to thinks that he had precluded the entire question of reconsideration by the declaration that there is no way by which the Senate can force the House conferees to take this question to the House. It is well known by some of us that many Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol and many members of a great committee in that body desire the opportunity to have a vote on these amendments.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In response to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that it is not possible for the Senate to force the House conferees to agree to anything, let me say that they represent the body at the other end of the Capitol; they are entirely free agents, so far as the Senate is concerned; and there is just as much reason in support of the statement of the Senator from Ohio that there is no way to force the House conferees to take this question back to the House as there would be in support of the statement that there is no way to force the House conferees to agree to anything that the Senate desires.

Mr. President, there is an element of sound justice involved in the proposition raised by the Senator from Alabama. Ordinarily, after the Senate has agreed to a conference report I should be very reluctant to vote or speak to upset that agreement. The time to determine the question logically is on the motion to agree to the conference report, and in very rare instances do I believe the Senate would be justified in reversing its action after having agreed to a conference report; but here is a case which, it seems to me, is worthy of serious consideration.

No man in either body can complain of an issue designed to give the body of which he is a Member the opportunity to express itself on an amendment involved in a conference; for, after all, a conferee is nothing if he does not represent the body to which he belongs. That applies as much to a Senate conferee as it does to a House conferee; and the only way in which fat jobs at public expense can be provided for in appropriation bills is for appropriation measures to take the course that this measure has taken, namely, to deny the body in disagreement with an amendment the opportunity to express itself respecting that amendment.

Without regard to the merits of this particular case, it is a good precedent, in my judgment, tending toward sane and honest legislation, to insist in cases of this character that the House in disagreement to an amendment shall have the opportunity to express itself on that amendment if it appears that substantial sentiment in that House is in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have not the floor. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I have the same difficulty in a conference in connection with a measure dealing with the S–4 disaster. It has been in conference nearly a month. I told the House conferees they could eliminate section 3, which provides for the appointment of a special commission to investigate the S–4 disaster, or they could adopt the House amendment, or they could report a disagreement. They will not do either. They refuse to let the House take a vote on the Senate amendment.

I, for one, am tired of being told by House conferees, "You have got to do so-and-so or the matter will fail entirely." If the Senate is to be an equal body it must have an equality in legislation that is being considered in the two bodies. In the case to which I refer the House conferees will not report a disagreement, they will not amend the measure so as to leave out section 3, and they will not take a vote in the House on the Senate amendment.

As far as I am concerned, I shall never agree to anything except one of those three propositions. They may take their choice. We are told that "the legislation will fail unless you do so-and-so," and they refuse to send it back to the House and report a disagreement. I think the time has come for the Senate to assert its rights as a coequal body with the House.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the status of the matter. As I understand, the specific question involved is the amendment which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] succeeded in placing on the appropriation bill with reference to attorney fees?

Mr. BLACK. Yes, sir. I will state the situation at this time as I see it.

I admit, of course, that I have not had the legislative experience of the very able and distinguished Senator from Wyoming—a man who, I believe, is credited with more years of service in this body than any other Member who sits here. I disagree with reluctance to any suggestion which the careful and painstaking chairman of the Appropriations Committee makes; but, with all due deference to the views of those who have served longer, it appears to me that if the Senate, after full debate, adopts an amendment, and that amendment is sent to a conference committee, certainly if this body has any dignity, if the Senate has any rights, if the Senate is bigger than its conferees and the conferees of the House, no person who is a Member of this body can object to sending the matter back to the House for a vote by them in order to determine whether or not they agree upon the amendment suggested here.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. FESS. My difficulty is the matter of procedure. How will we do it? Suppose we reconsider the conference report and get it back before this body. The purpose of the Senator from Alabama is to get the amendments over to the House to be voted on. Will the Senator tell me how it can be done?

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to do that. I insist, sir, that there is or should be no influence of any kind by people who are holding fat jobs at exorbitant salaries, or their friends, which is sufficient to justify the conferees of either House in declining to take a matter upon the floor and let the Members of that House pass upon it.

Mr. FESS. How is the Senator going to compel another House to do it if it does not want to?

Mr. BLACK. They will do it when you and your conferees let them know it has to be done. They are not going to take the responsibility of blocking legislation for the erection of important buildings. They will not take the responsibility, upon the unstable ground which they here occupy, of saying to the Senate, "No; we are two or three Members of the House. What is this Senate, that it dares to place upon a bill an amendment, and then ask that we present it to the House? We do not want the House to vote upon it. We do not want the facts to come out before the House."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. In reply to the Senator from Ohio, I will say that the House has a rule that Senate amendments of a certain character can not be accepted by its conferees until the House votes on them.

Mr. SMOOT. That is only in case of new legislation.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not care what the case is; if this amendment had been of that character, they could not vote on it unless it was submitted; yet they come here and say, "You must kick out a Senate amendment, and we refuse ever to let the House vote on it."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think this discussion has gone far afield. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that out of all the amendments that the Senate put on the bill the House yielded on nearly every one.

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to point out what the House yielded on, according to the report that was given me.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the report here just as it was, taking up each amendment.

Mr. BLACK. The report is—

> That the Senate recede from its amendments Nos. 3, 5, 7, 11, 12, 13, and 14.
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 2.

That is the report that has been given me; and on looking at amendment numbered 2——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has not referred to the place where the House recedes with amendments, and most of them were disposed of in that way. That is only a part of the report. It shows in the report where they receded with amendments.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not going into the merits or demerits of this proposition. What I object to is the House conferees saying, "You shall not have a vote of the House on this matter. You shall not be permitted to get the judgment of the House on this amendment."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suppose what the Senate really wants to learn is the facts in the case. The explanation will be given the Senate, and I hope the Senator will listen to what I have to say when we reach that point. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Alabama. I want him to have his say to the Senate, and then I wish to take a short time myself in answer to what the Senator has said.

Mr. BLACK. So far as going into the merits of this case is concerned, if Senators desire to go into the merits I suggested originally that if they would recommit this bill to the committee, we could have a fair hearing on it. They had plenty of time. It has been now more than a month—I believe about a month and a half—something like that. They did not do that, however. If there is any new evidence in the hands of the Senator from Utah, it was not obtained at a committee hearing, nor was it obtained from those who believe in the adoption of these amendments.

I do not know where the conferees received any information that they now have. I do know, however, that the Senate has adopted these amendments, and that the conferees—against whose motives, of course, I cast no insinuation; I do not want to be understood as doing that—have yielded without permitting a vote in the House.

I went to the conferees and told them that the request had been made of me by Members of the House that our committee stand on its amendments, so that they could get a chance to vote upon the matter. I had that request made by one of the ablest Members of the House, a man who has served there for many years, and who is familiar to a large extent with the situation here involved.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is the first time I have heard any such proposition.

Mr. BLACK. I went to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming, in the beginning and told him that I wanted them to insist upon letting the House vote on the matter, and that if there was any question raised or any new facts wanted I should be glad to present them to the conference committee; and I was informed by him then that the conference committee did not take up the duty of investigating the facts in the situation.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon. I have not stated to the Senator from Alabama nor to anybody else that conference committees never seek the facts in framing a report. We seek, of course, to find the facts from those who have them. So far as amounts paid to attorneys and things of that kind are concerned, we considered the books of the Shipping Board more reliable than even the Senator, who we so much admire and who is so ably putting his case before the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, if the conferees who voted against my amendment in the first place relied upon the books of the Shipping Board, and therefore receded from the amendments on the ground that the books of the Shipping Board showed that the Shipping Board was doing right, then I say that it is all the more reason why this matter should be referred back to the House for them to debate it, so that the facts can come out in open session from all sides of this controversy.

My attention was called by a distinguished Member of the House, after the report, to the fact that the books of the Shipping Board and the report which I have on my desk concerning the amount of business which they had disposed of credited the Shipping Board with disposing of business or having business to dispose of to the extent of $273,651,000, when the Shipping Board does not dispose of the business; but, according to the statement of Mr. Galloway, of the Department of Justice, it is handled by Mr. Galloway and his assistants, 31 in number.

They handled that business, amounting to $273,651.95, which the Shipping Board on its books, as shown here, give themselves credit for handling in the legal department. That statement can be proven by calling Mr. Galloway before the Senate committee or before the conference committee or before a committee of the House.

Not only that, but my attention was also called to the fact that Mr. Galloway's department had to transact last year business amounting to $1,838,945. For that they used 31 lawyers, at a total expense of $149,420. To handle one-fifth of that amount, practically, the Shipping Board had about 47 lawyers at an expense of somewhere near $300,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. There might be some question, and I do not think the Senator intended to reflect on the conferees.

Mr. BLACK. Not in any way.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that the Senate conferees stood fast time and time again, and we had different meetings. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is a Democrat, asked that the Senator's amendment be taken back to the House to be voted upon. The House conferees refused to do that, and I want to say for the Senate conferees that they did everything possible to reach an agreement until the very last moment, and, as I have said, the Senator from Virginia asked that the amendment be sent back to the House.

Mr. BLACK. I am glad the Senator has made that statement; but the fact remains that the House conferees declined to let the House vote on the amendment. Of course, the Senate conferees did stick out for weeks; there is no question about that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, what is the object of a conference? It is to get a concurrence between the House of Representatives and the Senate, an agreement on legislation, not that there shall be an agreement among the conferees. Conferees have no power to legislate. The House of Representatives certainly has a right to express its sentiment in regard to a measure. The conferees are merely agents, whose business it is to try to get the two Houses together, and that the House conferees should refuse to allow the House to vote is not right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senate yields its right to have the body at the other end of the Capitol express its views on a Senate amendment through the mere insistence of the House conferees, if we concede that principle, then the Senate can never have a vote by the body at the other end of the Capitol on a Senate amendment, if the House conferees happen to be opposed to the Senate amendment and are unwilling to permit their body to vote on it. In other words, the House conferees can defeat the express will of the Senate, even though that will is concurred in unanimously, by refusing to permit the House to vote on a Senate amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. It is getting to be the case that the Senate can not obtain a vote in the House on a Senate amendment, so as to see whether the judgment of the Senate and the judgment of the House concur. As I said, the only object of a conference is to get a concurrence of the minds of the two Houses, not of the conferees. It is the business of the conferees to try to get the Houses together. Yet the House conferees refuse to have a vote in the House on the Senate amendment to see whether the House will concur in it or not. We are having the same trouble now in a conference of which I am a member.

Mr. BLACK. I understand from the Senator from North Carolina that the Democratic Senators on the conference insisted to the end on the amendment going back to the House. Is that correct?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, the Democrats are not given much credit for believing in the program of economy.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I do not think it was a question of politics at all. I do not think there is any significance in the fact that two of the conferees who happened to be Democrats were reluctant to take the action which was finally taken by the conference. While I fully realize the impropriety of revealing on the floor of the Senate what takes place in a conference committee, I think I may say, without any breach of the general rule, that I at least was estopped from a more strenuous objection to the action taken by a statement made in the conference committee, the effect of which was to impeach the motives of those who were interested in the subject matter of this amendment, and that I find upon subsequent inquiry that apparently the charge made was utterly without basis, and should not have been made. In view of that fact, I shall feel at liberty, notwithstanding I signed the conference report, to vote to send the bill and amendments back to conference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further statement?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The statement just made by the Senator from Virginia is illuminating. It is an emphatic and conclusive reason why the Senate ought to reverse its attitude in agreeing to the conference report, and vote to send this matter back to conference.

It appears that there happened in conference an incident which influenced, not to say controlled, the action of the conferees, and that the incident was based on erroneous statements of fact. The conference was prompted to take its action and yield its attitude on the representation that there was an offensive motive prompting those who advanced and supported the amendment. Any conferee, under the influence of that statement, would be quicker to yield than under other circumstances. But if the Senate is to maintain its right to amend bills which come here from the body at the other end of the Capitol, under the circumstances now shown to exist there ought not to be any objection to sending this bill back to conference.

If it does go back to conference, the amendment will be voted on in the House or the bill will fail; and who will have the responsibility for its failure? They who apparently have practiced a fraud on the Senate of the United States by misrepresenting pertinent facts in the conference committee. There are no two sides to this issue now. If the Senate has respect for itself and for its conferees, it will take the action proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has alluded to the Democrats on the committee. I ask him to remember this, that so far as the two political parties are concerned—and I seldom allude to them in anything I have to say—the responsibility of the Shipping Board is with the Democrats entirely. It is of their own creation, and perhaps it now finds as little favor with them as it does with me and others. However, we may hate a kicking horse, but if it is hitched to a wagon and we are behind it, we will probably stand the kicking for a while and whip the horse and get along.

So far as I am concerned, in my service in the Senate as a conferee, though I regret the necessity that led to the creation of the Shipping Board, I am willing to forget that; it was done during the war; but that is no reason why we should vote otherwise than what I believe is right, under our rules and orders.

So far as conferees are concerned, Senators seem to regard it a duty, certainly it is a pleasure, to abuse conferees. I do not care anything about that. I always accept it. The more they say the better, so far as that is concerned. We know very well that when a man is a little excited and is criticizing the conferees, he is not sticking to the facts, and he knows it, and we know it. So that settles that.

I do not propose to give further time to the matter of those attorneys and their salaries. I have other things to do. But here is the question: What is a conferee? He is one who goes on the conference committee; does his duty because he is asked to be a conferee. Is he supposed to know what the body he represents wants him to do? I imagine so, and I think he usually does it. We have evidence of that in the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is going to break one of the great bills here, and he would break this if he was on the conference committee if he did not have his way. I admire his spunk. I hope he will get what he wants.

Under our rules—not, of course, under the Constitution—appropriation bills originate in the House. The House takes the Budget estimates which comprise the wishes and the statements and the desires of all the departments of the Government. The House undertakes to frame the bill in full. When they send it over to us it is a complete document. They put in everything they believe ought to go into the bill. We understand that. Therefore we are the aggressors from the time we get the bill in the Senate. So far as the Senate Committee on Appropriations is concerned, every one of the items in the bill is ferreted out, information is obtained about it, trial books are made so that the subcommittees can look through the items, and, finally, so that the committee can handle them. Then, after the bill is passed, we go hat in hand to do the best we can as conferees.

It is perfectly right, when we come back to the Senate, for the Senate to refuse to accept our report and to send it back if it desires to do so; and in that case it is, of course, our duty to go back to conference with it. There is no doubt about that.

It is true, as the Senator from Ohio has said, that we can not tell the House that they shall take this and the other item back to the House. But so far as I know we have never been refused when it came to asking a return conference, and, therefore, in this case I think that if the Senate is not satisfied and it wants to go about the matter, we should go at it according to the rules.

Under our rules we have a conference report presented, and it must first be voted down before other proceedings can be had.

Mr. HEFLIN. If my colleague will permit me, I would like to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. Will not the Senator now, because of the fact that the House has not had a chance to vote on this amendment, ask that this conference report be referred back?

Mr. WARREN. The Senate has a right to order that.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I regret very much that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations should have suggested that I have any particular interest in this item. I have not at all.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I had not the Senator in mind at all, and let me say now, while I have the opportunity, that if there is a man in the world who is more conscientious, and who better discharges his duty as a conferee, than the Senator from Virginia, I do not know where he is; I never saw him.

Mr. GLASS. I have nothing further to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was a conferee on the bill, and I thought because of the information of every respect which we received that was the basis of our agreement that the House ought to yield. Since the Senator from Virginia has made the statement that he has, I am going to ask the chairman of the conferees, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]——

Mr. BLACK. I would like to get through, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator from Wyoming, since the statement has been made by the Senator from Virginia, that we allow the matter to go back to conference and let the question come up in the House as to the subject referred to by the Senator from Virginia, and let it be debated there, and not here.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator from Alabama will yield, so that the matter may go back to conference in that way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in order that that may be done, I ask unanimous consent that the report be returned to conference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We must first reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in agreeing to the conference report.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. It may not be necessary to reconsider the conference report, but merely to ask for a further conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report. [Putting the question.] The conference report is not agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments and ask for a further conference, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be named by the Presiding Officer.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS.

COMMENTS ON TEAPOT DOME INVESTIGATION

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, in 1923 or 1924, I believe in the latter year, on the floor of the Senate I called the country's attention that former Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall was guilty of treason. I said he was a greater traitor than Benedict Arnold, because Arnold tried only to sell a little fortress on the Hudson River, while Fall was selling all the oil reserves after our ships had been converted into oil burners.

Fall immediately attacked the correctness of the statement and charged that he had been slandered. Since then investigations have disclosed that he was even more guilty than the information then apparently revealed. It now appears he was not acting alone, because no one who has read the recent investigation has any doubt that Will H. Hays had full knowledge of the things that Fall was doing and had done. No one can believe that he did not know that the bonds he was handling were a part of the price of Teapot Dome.

Mr. President, these investigations have disclosed that at least four members of the Harding Cabinet had the bonds or some part of them in their possession. No one who believes that men of intelligence do not act without information has any doubt but what they knew where the bonds came from and what the purpose of Mr. Hays was in handing them around. The most that can be said for Mr. Hays is to say that he was a fence; that he knew that certain goods were stolen goods and he was trying to help the thief find a market for them; that the Secretary of the Treasury, although he declined to aid in the marketing of the goods, after he had knowledge of what they were, refused to disclose this information, but handed them back so that the fence could find somebody else who would act for him.

The man who has information of a crime and conceals it can never go before the American public and say he is innocent. Why, Mr. President, if three American soldiers on the 30th day of September, 1780, had had no greater sense of duty than these men have manifested, Major Andre would have gone on his way down to New York and reported to General Howe, and Arnold would have delivered West Point to the British and might have sealed the fate of our Colonies. When Paulding and Williams and Van Wart arrested a horseman who was on his way down the Hudson River and he told them he was an American, first having said he was a British soldier, before learning that he was mistaken about their identity, if they had manifested no more curiosity and no more patriotism than Mr. Butler and Mr. Mellon and others who handled these bonds, they would have released Andre instead of looking into his shoes and finding evidence of his transaction with Arnold. And Arnold would have delivered West Point and many an American soldier would have died to correct that error. But those men, whose names have been preserved to posterity only because of the one fact, unlettered American soldiers, wearing only the uniform of privates, refused to release Andre, but disclosed his treason with Arnold, for which crime Andre was hanged, and every honest man throughout the ages has hated Arnold.

A Philadelphia paper said Mr. Mellon was thanked for his patriotic duty, or some words of that kind. But the very fact that Mr. Mellon kept those bonds, knew where they came from, declined to handle them, makes you know and me know that he knew they were tainted. He knew that two courts in the District of Columbia had been trying Albert B. Fall and Harry F. Sinclair and Edward L. Doheny, and had tried to trace the bonds that were a necessary link in the evidence that would warrant—nay, compel—a jury to convict those men. But he concealed the facts. He knew the Senate was trying to trace those bonds. He actually loaned investigators to the committee, but concealed the fact that he himself had had in his possession $50,000 of those bonds, and knew who had handled them, which he recognized were tainted and refused to handle, but refused to sell for the fence who was trying to get him to do so. He never disclosed the facts.

Mr. President, I am sorry to say that I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Restitution will do nothing to right those wrongs. Suppose some innocent person shall contribute money and hand it back to Will Hays to restore that which he got from Sinclair, that would not right the wrong. The offices bought with this corrupt money, the men who have gone unwhipped of justice because these Cabinet officers would not disclose these facts, are not righted because some person now, under the whip of party shame, shall restore the money. It is not the money that constitutes the infamy of this incident. It is the transaction itself. Therefore, there is no way this side of the mercy of heaven to make restitution in this infamous crime.

NORTH AMERICAN CO.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in the course of the debate some two weeks ago on Senate Resolution 83, referring to the financing of public utilities, I referred to the advance in the price of the stocks of some of the leading holding companies, including the North American Co., and in that connection stated that its stocks had advanced from 46 to something equivalent to 600.

My information in relation to that matter came from an article published in the New Republic, in which appeared a schedule of advances of that character. I used the figures in an address which I delivered in the Senate something like a year ago, saying at the time that I had been unable to confirm the figures, but no exception having been taken to the figures so far as I was advised, I assumed they were correct and in the course of my remarks alluded to the circumstance to which I have just referred.

Mr. President, I have a letter from the president of the North American Co. relating the circumstances attending the changes in the par value of the stock of the North American Co., from which it would appear that my statement was erroneous. Not desiring to do this company or any other company any wrong by any statement made by me on the floor of the Senate, I ask that the letter be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE NORTH AMERICAN CO.,
New York, March 3, 1928.

Mr. H. P. WILSON,
Investment Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I have noticed, on page 3037 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a statement regarding our stock which is in error. These figures seem to have been used very generally in the press. The facts are these:

There was originally a $100 par value stock of the North American Co. listed on the New York Stock Exchange in August, 1890.

This stock was reduced on January 21, 1901, one share of new $100 par value stock being issued for three of the original $100 shares.

On August 26, 1921, the shares of $100 par value were divided each into one share of $50 par value of preferred stock and one share of $50 par value of common stock.

On March 21, 1925, shares of $50 par value common were divided into five shares of $10 par value each. It was this last stock that was quoted at 46 in 1921.

Against the original listed stock of $300 par value there is now outstanding one share of $50 par value and five shares of common stock which is selling at around 60. In other words, against the original stock of the par value of $300 the market value of its equivalent is now around $360.

Very truly yours,

F. L. DAME, President.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Montana whether it is true, as I have seen stated, that immediately after the Senator from Montana so successfully championed the claims of the Montana Power Co. with reference to the Flathead Reservation, the stock of the Montana Power Co. went up, as I recollect, from 105 to 168.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am unable to advise the Senator with respect to the matter to which he alludes. I am able, however, to advise him that for some time prior to the time when I so successfully championed the cause of the Montana Power Co., as related by the Senator, the stock of the Montana Power Co. had been going up, and it had reached rather unusual proportions. That rise, so far as my information goes, antedated by some months the discussion to which the Senator refers. But I might also add that the explanation is quite easy, because since that time it is reported that a combination and consolidation between the Montana Power Co. and the Washington Power Co. have been accomplished, and it is now popularly believed that the rise in the price of the stock of the Montana Power Co. was occasioned by the prospect of that consolidation.

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps, however, the previous rise in the value of its stock was due to the anticipation of the Senator's success with reference to the Flathead Reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Maryland is, of course, entitled to indulge in any assumption with respect to that matter that he cares, but I am unable to speculate upon the subject.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the consideration of bills on the calendar until 2 o'clock, when the unfinished business will come up, and that we consider only unobjected bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

NAMING OF HIGHWAYS

The bill (S. 1182) to provide for the naming of certain highways through State and Federal cooperation, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

CHAPLAIN HORACE A. CHOUMARD

The bill (S. 511) to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, or his duly authorized representative, $1,500, being in full for and discharge of his claim for reimbursement for certain personal property lost in the flood and storm at Texas City, Tex., on the 16th and 17th days of August, 1915, without fault or neglect on his part and while in the military service of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1285) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 3, section 1, line 4, after the number "(1)," to strike out "at least 80 per cent of all appropriations under this act shall be utilized for the payment of salaries of extension agents in counties to further develop the cooperative extension system in agriculture and home economics, including the work with boys and girls, and (2)" and to insert:

At least 80 per cent of all appropriations under this act shall be utilized for the payment of salaries of extension agents in counties of the several States to further develop the cooperative extension system in agriculture and home economics with men, women, boys, and girls.

(2) Funds available to the several States under the terms of this act shall be so expended that the extension agents appointed under its provisions shall be men and women in fair and just proportions.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I desire to move to strike out the committee amendment on page 3, section 2, beginning in line 4, and to reinstate in the bill the portion proposed to be stricken out by the committee, so that the bill will read in its original terms as introduced in both the Senate and the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Delaware that a negative vote on the Senate committee amendment will have the same effect. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this is an unexpected procedure and many Senators are in their offices and did not anticipate that the calendar would be considered, I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edge	King	Shipstead

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, while the roll was being called I had a conversation with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], who informs me that a bill similar to the Senate bill has been passed by the House and is now before his committee. In view of that fact and of the further fact that there may be hearings upon the House bill, I ask that Senate bill 1285 go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Delaware the bill will be passed over.

FALSE INFORMATION REGARDING CRIMES IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 2277) relating to giving false information regarding the commission of crime in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall ask that that bill go over. I wish to say, however, that while no doubt the purpose of the bill is wholesome, yet it has possibilities for harm far greater than any good that can come from it. I do not intend that at this time the bill shall be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether that bill has reference to the citizens' association of prohibition snoopers and spies formed some time ago in the city of Washington?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not know where the bill originated. I have no objection to the consideration of measures that are calculated to promote the wholesome enforcement of prohibition; I favor them; but this bill makes it possible for one who intends to perform his duty to experience persecution. I do not think this bill can be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRUCE. I will ask the Senator to answer the question whether the bill does or does not relate to prohibition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not know whether it does or not. I do not think it has any more relation to crimes against the prohibition law than it has to any other crimes.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator does not know, that is the information I wanted to elicit.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My judgment is that it does not relate specifically or directly to the enforcement of prohibition. It relates to false information regarding the commission of any crime.

Mr. BRUCE. But if the Senator will pardon me for a moment——

Mr. HEFLIN. Regular order!

Mr. BRUCE. We all know that after that citizens' snooper association was formed it was accused of furnishing false information. I think that is the origin of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for. The bill will be passed over. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 2447) for the relief of the stockholders of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is necessarily absent. He asked me to request for him that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PORTER BROS. & BIFFLE

The bill (S. 1476) for the relief of Porter Bros. & Biffle, and certain other citizens, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], who introduced the bill, give us a brief explanation of it?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this bill has for its purpose the relief of some farmers and cattlemen in Oklahoma, who claim to have suffered damages by reason of the dipping of cattle by Government agents. The bill, if enacted, will confer jurisdiction on the district court of the eastern district of Oklahoma to hear, try, and determine whether or not these cattlemen suffered damages, and, if so, how much. It seeks to give the district court of the United States jurisdiction in place of settling the matter here in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRUCE. I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is a bill, as I understand, before one of the committees of the Senate dealing with the question of the liability of the Government for the torts of its agents. I think, instead of passing spasmodic, isolated bills, we had better have general legislation on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under objection.

JOSEPHINE DOXEY

The bill (S. 2524) for the relief of Josephine Doxey was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Utah feel in a sufficiently generous mood this morning to allow this poor old lady to obtain her $50 a month? A bill similar to this has passed the Senate heretofore, and I really think she is entitled to the amount.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. EDGE. I can not move the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, under objection.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1094) to amend the practice and procedure in Federal courts, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1271) to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds; and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] I think that bill had better go over; indeed, it is now on the program of the steering committee for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CITY OF NEW YORK

The bill (S. 459) for the relief of the city of New York was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have held this bill over at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I think he is prepared now to pass his opinion upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have a complete report on the bill from the Comptroller General. If we are confined to five minutes, I should have to let the bill go over temporarily, because I could not get through in five minutes.

Mr. COPELAND. I will ask that it go over without prejudice, then.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; let it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

BILLS AND RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is the unfinished business and will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2720) for the relief of David McD. Shearer was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 109) creating a committee of the Senate to investigate the sinking of the submarine S–4 was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1939) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask to have that bill go over in the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. That is my reason for making the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS IN HAWAII

The bill (S. 757) to extend the benefits of certain acts of Congress to the Territory of Hawaii was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to make a brief explanation of this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that the last time that bill came up there was an objection by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who has now withdrawn his objection.

The bill provides that the Territory of Hawaii, which heretofore has not shared equally with the States and Territories in the benefits conferred by the several acts passed by Congress for the advancement of agriculture in the States and Territories, shall now receive those benefits. The last time the bill was considered by the Senate, February 23, 1928, an amendment was agreed to putting the bill in the form of which the Secretary of Agriculture approved, and as it was drawn in the Department of Agriculture. That amendment, which may be found on page 3543 of the RECORD, was agreed to at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With that explanation, I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. On page 2, lines 4 and 5, after the numerals "1914," these words appear:

upon the same terms and conditions and to the same extent as the several States.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is reading from the original bill. The amendment has changed that. May I read the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only bill I have in my calendar.

Mr. BINGHAM. The amendment as adopted on February 23 includes section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. The permanent annual appropriations provided for in section 3 of said act of May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto are hereby authorized to be increased by an amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, but without diminishing or increasing the amount which any State is entitled to under the provisions of said act of May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not what I had reference to. I had reference to lines 4 and 5 in section 1.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is entirely changed.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator read it as changed? It seems to me the construction of this language would be that if they were to receive benefits to the same extent as the several States, that might go back for years and years.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the Senator that the amendment provided for certain specific amounts. Would the Senator like to have the amendment read?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I should like to have the Senator read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that this bill has been amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting a House bill; and the stage of amendment has been passed unless the Senate reconsiders its action on the substitute.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I read the amendment for the benefit of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know what the amendment is. All I have in my calendar is the original bill as reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the substitute, which is the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, the Territory of Hawaii shall be entitled to share in the benefits of the act entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," approved March 2, 1887, as amended and supplemented, and of the act entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," approved May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto: Provided, That the experiment station so established shall be conducted jointly and in collaboration with the existing Federal experiment station in Hawaii in enlarging and expanding the work of the said Federal station on cooperative plans approved by the Secretary of Agriculture; and the Secretary of Agriculture shall coordinate the work of the Territorial station with that of the Federal station and of the United States Department of Agriculture in the islands: Provided further, That the Territory of Hawaii shall make provision for such additional buildings and permanent equipment as may be necessary for the development of the work.

SEC. 2. To carry into effect the above provisions for extending to Hawaii the benefits of the act of March 2, 1887, and supplementary acts in the order and amounts designated by these acts, the following sums are hereby authorized to be appropriated in addition to the amounts appropriated to the Department of Agriculture for use in Hawaii: $15,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929; $20,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930; $22,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931; $24,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932; $26,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933; $28,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934; $30,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935; $50,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936; $60,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937; $70,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938; $80,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939; and $90,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and thereafter a sum equal to that provided for each State and Territory for agricultural experiment stations established under the act of March 2, 1887.

SEC. 3. The permanent annual appropriations provided for in section 3 of said act of May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto are hereby authorized to be increased by an amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act but without diminishing or increasing the amount which any State is entitled to under the provisions of said act of May 8, 1914, and of acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I see that the substitute leaves out the objectionable words as found in the original bill. So far as that part of it is concerned, I have no objection to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I objected to the consideration of this bill the other day because I thought it was projecting legislation into the future for an indefinite period of time. I ask the Senator now, if this bill is to be limited and circumscribed by the acts of Congress applying to other States, if it is proper to fix the amount to be appropriated each year. In other words, if there is a general act that is applicable, it seems to me that it would be improper to single out any State or any Territory and to fix in the act respecting that State or Territory the amount which should be appropriated each year.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; it does not do that. The reason why these specific amounts are mentioned in the bill as prepared by the Department of Agriculture was that the department felt that it was not quite fair that the Territory of Hawaii should suddenly become possessed of the full amount in proportion to what the States receive, because the States themselves have come to that amount gradually. Therefore this is graded. It does not look forward to the future at all, but merely refers to acts which have been passed, and not to those which may be passed.

Mr. KING. As I recall the reading by the clerk of the substitute, it carries appropriations up to the year 1940.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is to carry into effect the provisions for extending to Hawaii the benefits of the act of March 2, 1887, and supplementary acts, in the order and amount designated.

Mr. KING. Would supplementary acts give to Hawaii $80,000 in the year 1940?

Mr. BINGHAM. In 1940 the amount authorized to be appropriated would be $90,000; and may I say to the Senator that if the Territory of Hawaii were to receive to-day that which personally I believe she is entitled to under the laws as passed which provided for the benefit of these acts to go to States and Territories, she would receive that amount.

Mr. KING. What amount would the State of Arizona or Louisiana or Texas receive in 1940?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am sorry I have not at hand the figures for the different States; but that is the information I received from the department.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that there was some period reached when the amount became fixed and was not progressive, and that that static period was reached before 1940.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; it says up to 1940, "and thereafter a sum equal to that provided for each State and Territory for agricultural experiment stations established under the act of March 2, 1887." In other words, they do not get the full sharing in this agricultural legislation until 1940.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator for information, Does the State of Texas, for instance, or the State of New York, get no more than the Territory of Hawaii would get in 1940 and in years thereafter, regardless of population or area?

Mr. BINGHAM. I regret that I have not that information at hand, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. It seems to me it would not be a discrimination to give a large State like Texas or Pennsylvania or New York—large in area and large in population—a greater amount than a small State or Territory.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will realize that the Territory of Hawaii pays in income taxes into the Treasury of the United States an amount equivalent to the total amount received from more than 12 States.

Mr. KING. Oh, I appreciate the importance of Hawaii in many, many ways, and I am very much in sympathy with whatever Hawaii demands. I am for the Hawaiians, for the people of the islands; but I was just wondering if any distinction is made between a small State like Rhode Island, for instance, and New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am informed by the Senator's colleague that the amount is the same in connection with all States with regard to these particular, specific appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the appropriations are all the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2711) for the relief of Walter W. Johnston was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting war was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This joint resolution is reported adversely.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let it go over.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, as this joint resolution is reported adversely, I should like to have it indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I hope the Senator from Maryland will not make that motion in the absence of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BRUCE. I will not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution goes over upon objection.

PARK POLICE IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 1628) relating to the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act entitled "An act to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force, the United States park police, and the fire department of the District of Columbia," approved May 27, 1924 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 43, p. 175), is hereby amended by striking out said section and substituting therefor the following: "Hereafter the salaries of members of the United States park police force shall be the same as the salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia in similar or corresponding grades."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish the Senator reporting the bill would make an explanation of it.

Mr. CAPPER. The Senator who reported the bill is not present, but I can make an explanation of it. I introduced the bill. It simply puts the park police on the same basis as the Metropolitan police so far as salaries are concerned. For many years there was a difference of $100 in the matter of uniforms.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that.

Mr. CAPPER. This bill puts the park police on the same basis, so that they will get the same salary as members of the other police force.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not to consolidate the two forces?

Mr. CAPPER. Not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. It is simply to increase the salaries of the park police.

Mr. CAPPER. To make an increase of $100. There are approximately 70 park policemen and officers. The total increase would be $6,400 a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. What difference does it make in the salaries?

Mr. CAPPER. It increases those of the park policemen.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much?

Mr. CAPPER. One hundred dollars a year, in lieu of the uniform which had before been given to the Metropolitan police. It requires the parity of the park police and the Metropolitan police, because of the fact that a couple of years ago Congress allowed the Metropolitan police an increase of $100.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 133) for the relief of Kenneth B. Turner was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

OKFUSKEE COUNTY JUDICIAL DISTRICT

The bill (H. R. 7011) to detach Okfuskee County from the northern judicial district of the State of Oklahoma and attach the same to the eastern judicial district of the said State was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I have received a number of letters from persons living in the State of Oklahoma complaining about this bill. I note that the senior Sentaor from that State [Mr. PINE] is not present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall be glad to answer any questions the Senator may wish to propound.

Mr. WILLIS. I am not advised about the details of the bill, but I have received a number of letters from persons complaining about the bill. I am not able to state what the ground of the complaint is. I would be willing to hear any statement the Senator might make.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill is purely a local measure. It has for its purpose the transfer of one county from the northern judicial district of Oklahoma and attaching that county to the eastern district.

Mr. WILLIS. What is the object of such transfer?

Mr. THOMAS. The railroad facilities are much better to Muskogee than to Tulsa, and the citizens of Okfuskee County prefer to have their business transacted in the city of Muskogee rather than in the city of Tulsa.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill appears to be approved by the Department of Justice.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I have a letter from a firm of attorneys in Oklahoma City, in which it is stated that the real purpose of the bill is political, and its sponsors hope through its passage to deprive some 1,500 or 2,000 negro citizens of Okfuskee County of the right of franchise under the constitution and laws of the State of Oklahoma. The letter states:

> This right is about to be secured for these negro citizens through litigation now pending in the United States court for the northern district, and it is the hope of the authors of the bill that the transfer of the county to another district may work to the disadvantage of these citizens in this litigation.

Can the Senator enlighten us about that?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know who wrote the letter, Mr. President, but if the bill should pass, it would not change the jurisdiction of the litigation now pending. Any case now pending in a court would still be tried in the court where it is pending. The measure would affect only future litigation.

Mr. WILLIS. In order that we may have an opportunity to look into this matter, especially, as far as I am concerned, in order that I may have a chance to examine the correspondence, I wish the Senator would permit the bill to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

STANDARD HAMPERS AND BASKETS

The bill (S. 2148) to fix standards for hampers, round-stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is pending.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few days ago I submitted to the Department of Agriculture for its consideration the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, the object of which was to include a five-eighths-bushel hamper. I received from the Department of Agriculture a statement concerning the reason for the elimination of that sized hamper. A copy of that letter I sent to the Senator from New Jersey, the Senator from Delaware, and the Senator from Maryland, for their consideration. Personally, having the bill in charge, I am not inclined at all to force the elimination of this hamper, and if these Senators from the respective States where this hamper is used believe that it should remain a recognized measure, I am inclined to accept the amendment and insert it in the bill, irrespective of the attitude of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I hesitate very much to ask the Senator to delay the consideration of the bill longer, as he has been very courteous, but only yesterday or the day before I sent a copy of his letter to those people in New Jersey who had expressed an interest in the matter, and I would like to have their reply before we act on the matter.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. That the Senator may have an opportunity further to hear from his constituents, I ask that the bill go over for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CROP INSURANCE

The bill (S. 2149) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate all phases of crop insurance was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is a very large and important measure. I stated a few days ago that it is so important that I am preparing a speech on the subject, and not having had time to conclude that work, I shall ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

HORTICULTURAL EXPERIMENT WORK IN GREAT PLAINS AREA

The bill (S. 2832) providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the southern Great Plains area was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DECORATIONS BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

The bill (H. R. 5898) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I want to state, in reference to this bill, that I have been trying to receive some information from the War Department which I have been unable up to this time to get. Just as soon as I receive that information I will have the amendment ready I wish to offer and will not ask for any further delay on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2327) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

TRANSACTIONS IN COTTONSEED OIL

The bill (S. 1414) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in cottonseed oil by regulating transactions on future exchanges, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DENEEN. Let that go over.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. DENEEN. I shall have to object to this bill. I received a letter this morning relating to the bill, and I have had no opportunity to look into it.

Mr. MAYFIELD. May I make a statement regarding the measure?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois withhold his objection?

Mr. DENEEN. I withhold the objection.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I will make a statement with reference to this bill, and then Senators who object to its consideration will understand what they are objecting to.

This bill will not affect the New York or the Chicago Cotton Exchanges. It will, however, affect the New York Produce Exchange. The cottonseed-oil interests of the South think that the contract of the New York Produce Exchange is unfair.

When the cottonseed-oil manufacturers of the South took this matter up with me last year, I wrote the president of the New York Produce Exchange and suggested that we have Secretary Hoover pass upon its contract, and if he said that the contract affecting cottonseed oil was a fair contract, no legislation would be proposed dealing with this subject. The suggestion was not accepted, and therefore this legislation.

This measure simply places under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture those exchanges dealing in cottonseed-oil option contracts. The Capper-Tincher law places under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture all grain exchanges dealing in grain-future contracts. The Smith-Lever Act places under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture cotton-future exchanges that have cotton-option contracts. Then what objection can be offered to this bill, which would only place under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture those exchanges dealing in cottonseed-oil contracts?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, every cottonseed grower wants the legislation.

Mr. MAYFIELD. That is true.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is not one of them objecting to it.

Mr. MAYFIELD. We had extensive hearings on this measure. Telegrams, petitions, and letters came to me from practically every cottonseed-oil manufacturer in the South indorsing this bill, and every Senator from cotton-producing States indorses this legislation.

Under the contract of the New York Produce Exchange, the producers of cottonseed and the cotton oil millmen who manufacture cottonseed oil are at a great disadvantage. I certainly hope that there will be no objection to the consideration of the proposed legislation.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, objection is made to one section. I am not familiar with the bill. I have written for information, and I will have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

Mr. MAYFIELD. This is the third time the bill has been passed for the purpose of giving Senators an opportunity to study it. I hope those Senators present at least will read the bill, and that there will be no further objection to its consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I would like to have the privilege of making an inquiry of the Senator from Texas. I think the Senator in discussing the bill said that there had been extensive hearings.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Not this year.

Mr. MAYFIELD. We had no hearings on the bill this year, but last year we had extensive hearings, and those hearings were printed and placed on the desks of Senators.

Mr. McNARY. I was sure of that, but with the statement of the Senator in it the RECORD would indicate that we had had hearings this year.

Mr. MAYFIELD. We had no hearings on the bill this year.

Mr. McNARY. Only yesterday I had protests from a committee representing the Produce Exchange of New York, who were complaining because we did not have hearings this year. I said that the Committee on Agriculture had had no notification of a desire for a hearing.

It seems they had written to the former chairman of the committee. Hence they did not have an opportunity to be heard. The RECORD now shows clearly that we did not have hearings this year.

Mr. MAYFIELD. At the hearings held last year on this same bill the representatives of the New York Exchange appeared and were given full opportunity to present their views on the proposed legislation.

Mr. McNARY. That is true. It was only for the accuracy of the RECORD that I spoke.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, if there are people who want to be heard on the bill, a committee from a great exchange like that, it seems to me the proper course would be to refer the bill back to the committee and hold hearings.

Mr. MAYFIELD. These people have already had a hearing on this bill. Why should the Senate have its time consumed on further hearings when we have so many important measures before us?

Mr. SACKETT. There may be other reasons why they should be heard. If people ask for a hearing, I do not see why they should not be given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the people representing the New York Produce Exchange did ask for a hearing, but they were unaware of the fact that the chairmanship had been changed, and their letter was addressed to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and held by him. So they have been denied the privilege of a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture, and in my judgment they should be heard.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, they had a full opportunity to be heard. They have a contract under which they have an unconscionable advantage that no honest man ought to want to keep, and they want the hearings, and everybody knows the kind of hearings they want is the kind that would prevent action. Every man who produces this product knows the contract is unfair, and the exchange are as conscious of it as the other people, and they want merely no action at all. That is the fact of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1728) placing service postmasters in the classified service, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1131) to encourage and promote the production of livestock in connection with irrigated lands in the State of Wyoming, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PHIPPS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 777.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War.

Mr. TYSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Deneen	Kendrick	Schall	Wheeler
Dill	Keyes	Sheppard	Willis

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I desire to call up a matter not related to the unfinished business. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4203) for the relief of A. S. Guffey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CARAWAY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate, known as the emergency officers' retirement bill, has been before the Senate for a number of years. It has twice been passed by the Senate, the first time by a vote of 50 in favor and 14 against, and the second time by a vote of 63 in favor and 14 against.

The bill provides for the retirement of emergency officers who were in the World War and who were disabled in that service, and puts them upon the same basis for retirement as to pay, allowances, and so forth, as that which governs the Regular Army of the United States when officers from the Regular Army are retired. It provides that they shall be paid three-fourths of the pay which they were drawing at the time they were discharged from the Army. The whole administration of the bill is to be under the United States Veterans' Bureau. An officer is to be retired who has not less than 30 per cent of permanent disability according to the ratings of the United States Veterans' Bureau. Officers who are found to be below 30 per cent are not retired under the provisions of the bill.

It is provided in the bill, furthermore, that all officers who may be retired shall be put upon a separate list known as the emergency officers' retired list. This list is to be made out each year by the United States Veterans' Bureau and furnished to The Adjutant General of the Army, and is then to be published with the regular retired list of the Regular Army. All of those officers who are found to be less than 30 per cent permanently disabled are to be put upon a retired list also as a matter of honor and consideration for their services, although they are not to be paid more than they are being paid now. That is also to be considered as a part of the emergency officers' retired list.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has an amendment which he will offer and which will include also all of the emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps who have not yet been retired. That amendment I have stated I would accept as an amendment to the bill when the Senator from Maine shall offer it at the proper time. It would include officers of the Navy and of the Marine Corps who are disabled in the same proportion and under the same conditions of service that are provided for the Regular Army retired officers and emergency officers.

Mr. President, there were nine classes of officers in the World War. There were the regular officers of the Regular Army, the emergency officers of the Regular Army, and the provisional officers of the Regular Army. Then there were the regular officers of the Navy, the emergency officers of the Navy, and the provisional officers of the Navy. Then there were the regular officers of the Marine Corps, the emergency officers of the Marine Corps, and the provisional officers of the Marine Corps.

Congress has passed a bill giving retirement to the emergency officers of the other services except of the Army. There are eight classes of officers who have already been retired and are now on the retired list under the same conditions that officers of the Regular Army are allowed to be retired, and are drawing three-quarters of the pay which they had at the time they were discharged from the service of the United States.

Mr. President, our idea is to put the emergency officers of our Army upon an equality with those who have been retired from the Navy and the Marine Corps. We feel that this is only an act of justice and is carrying out the traditions of the United States in retiring its officers in the past, from Revolutionary War days to this good hour, except that instead of the word "retirement" they have used the word "pension" in the bills which have given a pension instead of retirement. The word "pension" has been held to mean practically the same as the word "retirement."

Mr. President, I am not going into detail about the provisions of the bill. I feel that the Senate is fully informed about it, that it knows the details of the bill and that it is unnecessary for me to go further, unless there are some questions which I can answer that any Senator may desire to propound.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will my colleague tell us about how many officers will receive retirement pay under the terms of the bill?

Mr. TYSON. I will state for the information of the Senate that a list of those who will be retired under the terms of the bill has been prepared by the United States Veterans' Bureau. Including all the officers of the Army and of the Navy and of the Marine Corps who have now been found to be 30 per cent permanently disabled there will be 3,251, and the actual expense to the Government, if the bill is enacted into law, will be $4,985,100 annually. We are now paying out in annual compensation to these officers $2,841,960. Deducting that from the total under the bill would leave $2,143,140 annual increased cost of retirement.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is an increase in general terms of about 100 per cent?

Mr. TYSON. Not quite 100 per cent, but about 90 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say to my colleague that I am very heartily in favor of the bill and I hope the Senate will pass it by the same large majority it has already passed it twice before.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that there are more than 10,000 officers on the active list who are drawing compensation. They are to be added to the percentage of those having above 30 per cent disability. The Senator has said that the number is about 3,000, but when we take into consideration the probable increase in the list we must realize that the number will soon be 10,000.

May I say that the number of officers who have made application to the bureau for compensation exceeds 40,000, and that does not include, by the way, officers of the Navy and officers of the Marine Corps? There were only 200,000 officers and more than 40,000 have sought compensation; 40,000 will soon be upon the retired list if this bill shall go through; then there will be 10,000 more and 10,000 more; no man can tell their number. When the Senator indicates such a small number, I am fraid he misconceives the situation.

Mr. Greenbaum stated a few years ago that if retirement, with the small compensation then proposed to be paid was given to officers of the Civil War—and it is proposed in this bill to discriminate against them—it would cost more than $25,000,000 a year.

Mr. TYSON. I do not think that the Senator from Utah understands that all such officers have to make application within two years from the time of the passage of this bill or else they are barred.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee further yield to me?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Tennessee knows that if we shall establish this precedent it will be the entering wedge. The two years' limit will be abolished; and all these officers will come under the law. Then will come privates, for hundreds of privates have come to me and said, "If Congress is going to give retirement privileges to my brothers, to my relatives who did not see as much service as I did, I want retirement privileges, and I want the same compensation that they get." So that we shall have to expend from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 annually within a short time if this bill shall be passed.

Mr. TYSON. That will depend entirely upon Congress; of course, we may pass as many pension bills as we please; but there is nothing in the pending bill that would permit such a thing as the Senator from Utah suggests. There are only 3,251 officers who have been found to have 30 per cent permanent disability; and, in addition, any officer who does not make his application within two years after the passage of the bill will be barred. It is shown that what the Senator from Utah suggests can not happen, for the reason that already there have been 296 naval and marine officers retired by law. After two years, if they failed to apply, they were barred, and there have been no retirements of emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps for the last five or six years except by the passage by Congress of special bills. There have been about seven special bills which have been passed by the Congress retiring such officers, showing that there would be no extraordinary effort on their part to secure retirement by special bill, and it is entirely within the discretion of Congress as to whether it will pass any further legislation along this line.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, have any such special bills been enacted into law?

Mr. TYSON. Seven special bills have been enacted for naval and marine officers, but since the World War not one emergency Army officer has been retired and given the same privileges as naval and Marine Corps officers have.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has that been due to the policy of the Naval Affairs Committee as contrasted with the policy of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. TYSON. It has been due to the fact that the Navy Department has approved of this legislation and that the Secretary of the Navy himself wrote a letter approving the bill which was introduced for the Navy, but the War Department has repeatedly refused to approve such legislation until lately.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Have special bills been introduced for the emergency officers who served in the Army?

Mr. TYSON. No such bill has been introduced. With the exception of the general bill, no effort, so far as I know, has been made by any one single individual in the Army to get a bill passed for himself.

Mr. McKELLAR. The junior Senator from Tennessee is mistaken in that, for I have introduced several such bills and have been turned down by the Committee on Military Affairs in each instance. That committee has a policy different from that which the Naval Affairs Committee has pursued, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that I have introduced such bills, and I think other Senators have introduced some, all of which have been turned down.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There has been a difference in policy as between the Navy and the Army?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Or rather between the committees having jurisdiction of those services?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; with the committees.

Mr. TYSON. The General Staff of the Army has until recently been opposed to this bill, but, as I understand, they are now making no further objection to it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I notice that the committee's report on the bill, which is now before the Senate, states that the War Department approves the bill, but I can not find such a statement in any place in the letter from the Secretary of War which is printed as a part of the report which was submitted by the Senator.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I will state for the information of the Senate that, of course, I did not intend to put anything in the report that was not justified. The department stated that it was up to Congress to determine what policy it should pursue, and the only criticism it made of the bill was the fact that it thought that, perhaps, there might be some change or clarification of the meaning as to the benefits and privileges which officers on the retired list would receive.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The only expression of opinion that I find in the War Department's report on the bill is the statement that the bill is in conflict with the President's financial program.

Mr. TYSON. That is true; it is stated that it is in conflict with the President's financial program; but I do not find any opposition to the bill in the letter from the War Department. I will read the letter if it is desired.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee permit an interruption?

Mr. TYSON. Yes.

Mr. KING. First, I desire to make an observation in connection with the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. President, there was a bill introduced in the Senate and referred to the Naval Affairs Committee which, without due consideration, without understanding the implications, went through; but, as soon as Congress saw what it meant, it promptly repealed it. So all the emergency naval officers are not being retired; but before this bill shall be passed here the Senator from Maine will be heard asking that it be amended to include naval officers and Marine Corps officers.

Mr. TYSON. I have already said that we have accepted the amendment of the Senator from Maine. That will add only a few more officers.

Mr. KING. It will add many more.

Mr. TYSON. The number is set forth in the statement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that in the cases to which the Senator refers the Navy Department approved the retirement?

Mr. KING. I do not think so; I am not sure whether they did or not.

Mr. TYSON. I will ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, what is the attitude of the Navy Department in regard to the retirement of naval and Marine Corps officers who served during the World War?

Mr. HALE. In the past the Navy Department has repeatedly recommended that general legislation be enacted to take care of them. There have been a number of private bills enacted by Congress to take care of individuals, but the Navy Department has taken the ground that it should be done by general legislation.

Mr. KING. They have not recommended such legislation.

Mr. HALE. It is fair to say, however, that they took the matter up with the Budget Bureau, and the answer was made that the Senator has already given, that such legislation would not be in accordance with the President's financial program.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, is it not true that the Navy Department has uniformly opposed giving the retirement privilege to emergency naval officers unless their retirement pay came out of the appropriations for the Veterans' Bureau and not out of the appropriations for retired pay of the Navy?

Mr. TYSON. That may be true, but we are providing that the pay for the retired emergency officers shall come out of the funds of the United States Veterans' Bureau. It will not come out of the appropriation for the Navy Department under the terms of this bill, but out of the appropriation made for the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator to say the War Department had not opposed this proposed legislation.

Mr. TYSON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I said that it had opposed it until recently, as I understand.

Mr. KING. I was going to say that Secretary Baker opposed it and wrote a very strong letter in opposition; that Secretary Weeks wrote a number of letters in opposition to it; that Secretary Stimson opposed it; and that every Secretary of War, so far as I know, who has expressed himself upon the subject has opposed this proposed legislation because it would upset the policy of the Government and would be unjust and discriminatory.

Mr. TYSON. I deny that it is contrary to the policy of the Government from the Revolutionary War down to this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. However that may be, may I suggest to the Senator that very clearly the Secretary of War in his letter of January 21, 1928, by inference, at all events, favors the proposed legislation.

Mr. TYSON. I so understand. He does not oppose it, and there is nothing in his letter to indicate that he opposes it. I have spoken to high ranking members of the General Staff of the Army, and they say that this is a just bill and ought to be passed. They have begun to realize that emergency officers under like conditions ought to have the same pay as Regular Army officers.

I should like to read a portion of the letter of the Secretary of War, in view of the fact that the Senator from Pennsylvania seems to feel that the Secretary of War is opposed to this bill:

> Under existing law the regular officer is granted the rights of retirement on account of physical disabilities incurred in line of duty, whereas the emergency officer must look, if so disabled, to the relief afforded by the war risk insurance act as amended.
> While I feel that it would be better administration to have the Veterans' Bureau charged with all administrative acts, the War Department would be glad to do this, if Congress so desires. In case it should be deemed best that the War Department publish the list, I would suggest that the bill specifically provide that the Veterans' Bureau be charged with the responsibility for preparation and maintenance of the list and submission of the same annually to the War Department for publication.

I will now read the portion of the letter which I think refers to the attitude of the War Department concerning this bill. The Secretary of War says:

> In general, any such relief measure should conform to our traditional policies. Its administration should be in accord with sound business principles and the benefits conferred should be equitable. The determination of whether these policies are followed, and the cost, the extent to which and the manner in which relief or benefits to which they may be entitled are granted to disabled emergency officers or enlisted men, is a matter to be determined by the Congress.
> If any additional information from the War Department is desired, I shall be pleased to furnish it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I understand the Senator's position, he is of the opinion that both the War Department and the Navy Department approve this proposed legislation, but that the Budget Bureau does not approve of it because it conflicts with the financial program of the administration.

Mr. TYSON. The War and Navy Departments, so far as I know, have not absolutely approved it in so many words, but they certainly have not disapproved it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They have based whatever objection they have made upon a conflict with the financial program of the administration.

Mr. TYSON. Apparently so. That is the only objection, so far as any disapproval is concerned, that is set out in any letter which I have received or any report which I have read, and I have, I think, read all that have come from both the House and Senate committees.

Mr. President, there is no great amount of money involved in this bill to be expended for these officers who went to the front, shed their blood, came back wounded and disabled, and whose capacity to make a living has been very greatly impaired and in many instances absolutely obliterated.

It is not necessary for me to go into details concerning this measure and I am not going to undertake to do so. I believe Senators are fully informed about the bill. They realize the justice of the position of these officers; they have repeatedly voted on this question and, therefore, what I want is to have the bill brought to a vote, for I believe if it can be brought to a vote the Senate will take the same stand that it has heretofore taken and pass this just measure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator is quite right in not prolonging the debate, in view of the previous debates and the well-known sentiment of the Senate favoring this measure, but I should like to ask him, before he concludes, what do the records show as to the percentage of emergency officers who were killed or wounded in the World War in comparison with the number of officers of the Regular Army who were killed or wounded?

Mr. TYSON. There were 2,191 battle casualties; that is to say deaths, of officers in the World War, and of that number 93 per cent, or about 2,040, were emergency officers, and 151, or 7 per cent, were Regular Army officers.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the explanation of that? Why should the percentage of emergency officers who were wounded or killed be so exceedingly great in comparison with the number of Regular Army officers?

Mr. TYSON. I assume that it was due to the fact that the officers of the Regular Army, as a rule, had higher rank and were not exposed so much as were the emergency officers. I doubt if we have ever been in a war where the company officers were more courageous and owing to the many engines of destruction exposed themselves more than they did in the World War.

I want to say, Mr. President, that in all past wars, so far as I know, there has been a greater percentage of private soldiers or enlisted men killed than of officers; but in this war the most extraordinary thing happened, when more of emergency officers were killed in proportion than of private soldiers or enlisted men.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean that there were 55 per cent more officers who actually died of wounds than private soldiers?

Mr. TYSON. No. I said the percentage is higher considering the number of men and officers engaged.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator does not feel called upon to impugn the courage of officers who served in wars heretofore.

Mr. TYSON. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator were to refresh his memory of the Civil War, he would find that until at least two years had passed the company officers had to take their positions in front of their enlisted men, while in the recent war the officers from colonel up saw but comparatively little service. Even in the Civil War, at the Battle of Gettysburg, General Anderson put his cap on his sword and rode into the enemy's battle line and died under their guns.

While I am for the Senator's bill, I hope he does not feel compelled to reflect on the courage of the officers who served in previous wars.

Mr. TYSON. I do not understand the Senator. I should like to have the Senator explain what he means.

Mr. CARAWAY. If it requires any explanation, I am not going to sit here and have the Senator say that heretofore officers did not display courage.

Mr. TYSON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I have not said anything of that kind.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, read the remarks.

Mr. TYSON. If I said so, then I made a mistake. I did not intend to say so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TYSON. What I intended to say was that in the World War, out of every 1,000 officers who served in the Infantry, 80 were killed, and out of every 1,000 enlisted men, 51 were killed. That was what I intended to say; in other words, that there was a greater percentage of officers killed than of enlisted men—not, of course, that there were as many in actual numbers, but a greater percentage. I was trying to show the courage of the officers of this war and how they went forward and took the risks, and how they were killed and wounded and disabled by virtue of the fact that they went forward and did their duty fully, and exposed themselves as much as did the private soldiers of the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understood the Senator, he said that some 2,100 officers were killed, and that 93 per cent of the 2,100 were emergency officers and 7 per cent were officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. TYSON. That is the information we get from Leonard P. Ayres, of the General Staff.

Mr. McKELLAR. The question I want to ask is this: Has the Senator any figures showing the relative percentage of those that were wounded in the war—what percentage of Army officers wounded were emergency officers, and what percentage were regular officers?

Mr. TYSON. I have not that information. I will state for the information of the Senate and the Senator that Ayres's book shows, according to the report I have, that 8,122 officers were wounded in action.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All together?

Mr. TYSON. Of these, 3,195 are listed as severely wounded. As only 3,030—this is what we had here before when the matter was brought up—of the emergency Army officers are now rated at more than 30 per cent disabled, it will be seen that many of the severely wounded officers have died or are now so recovered, nearly 10 years after the fighting, that their disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent permanent. This legislation cares for the severely disabled officers. "Severely wounded" usually means one whose survival is uncertain.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. TYSON. I shall be glad to.

Mr. KING. The Senator has been eulogizing—and in that I agree with him—the bravery of our officers on the battle front. Will he be willing to limit the operation of this bill to those who were upon the battle front, those who saw service; or does the bill include the clerks—and there were thousands of them here—who were lieutenants and captains and majors in the United States, and the thousands who had good jobs here, who never were within a thousand miles of a rifle shot?

Mr. TYSON. I will state for the information of the Senator that the bill provides that all persons who served as officers of the Army of the United States during the World War, and who during such service incurred physical disability in line of duty——

Mr. KING. I know what the bill provides; but the Senator has been paying a very deserved tribute to the bravery of our officers in France who were upon the fighting line. Is he willing to limit the retirement privilege to those who really did fight, or does he want to give the privilege to those who were in clerical positions here, and who never did any military service in the sense of being upon the firing line or taking any part in military maneuvers or taking part in military units?

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I am willing to give the emergency officer exactly what the regular officer gets.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator is unwilling to limit the bill to those who did the fighting?

Mr. TYSON. I am unwilling to do anything beyond what is done in this bill, namely, to give a man who went into the World War a fair deal and the same consideration as if he had been in the Regular Army.

I wish to state for the informaiton of the Senator that the emergency officers were older men, as a rule. Men who were under 27 years of age were put in the Regular Army as provisional officers. Those men get the same privileges to-day that the Regular Army officer does; and 58 of those young men under 27 years of age who were disabled in battle have been retired. Why should you not give the same benefit to an emergency officer that you give to a man who went out and trained alongside of a man who might happen to be two or three years older than he was, and yet who suffered disability under the same conditions? Yet your idea is to give it to the Regular Army emergency officer or provisional officer, and not give it to the emergency officer who is no longer in the Army. I do not see any justice in that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have some figures here from a publication issued by the War Department which show that 2,040, or 93 per cent, of the officers who were killed in action came from the class of emergency officers who are denied retirement, while 7 per cent, or 151, came from the class known as Regular and provisional Army officers, which class already have retirement rights.

Mr. TYSON. Exactly.

I want to give a little more information about the regular retirement of officers. I do not want to be misunderstood. You can not have a Regular Army worth anything in this country, or anywhere else for that matter, unless you have a retired list, unless the officers who are in the Regular Army realize and know that they are going to be retired when they are disabled, from whatever cause. At the beginning of the war there were only 6,000 Regular officers in the Regular Army. I do not know how many went in and out during the whole of the war, because, of course, there were more than that number in the Regular Army during the World War. Many of them were killed, disabled, or resigned, or went out from some other cause, but that was the number at the beginning of the war. Since the beginning of the World War and up to 1926, 1,109 Regular Army officers have been retired for disability. This statement does not say "from wounds." It says "from disability."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How many, please?

Mr. TYSON. One thousand one hundred and nine have been retired for disability and 645 Regular Army officers have been retired for reasons other than disability, a total of 1,754 Regular Army officers retired since the beginning of the war. In other words, assuming that there were seven or eight thousand Regular officers during the whole of the World War, almost one-fourth of all that number have been retired for one reason or another; and in addition to that I have these figures as to the amount of money which was expended in the retirement of officers:

In 1917 only $2,700,000 was appropriated for pay of retired officers of the Army,

For 1927 a total of $7,364,000 was appropriated for this purpose, being an increase of $4,664,000.

Mr. President, I think that is all right. I have no objection to it. I am making no criticism whatever of it. It simply shows, however, that in the Regular Army we have had more than one-half as many men retired since the beginning of the World War as are proposed to be retired under this bill out of 200,000 emergency officers who were in the World War. So it seems to me that this is a very small number, and that this is a very reasonable proceeding, and that 30 per cent disability is a very high percentage to require a man to have before he can get retirement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suppose some of those retirements were due to age.

Mr. TYSON. They were due to age, and for all reasons—disability, and one thing and another—and, of course, very properly so. I am not making any criticism. On the contrary, I think it was absolutely necessary and proper and right, in the interest of the efficiency of the Army.

So, Mr. President, I think if there are more officers retired after this bill is passed than should be retired it is the Congress that is at fault, and not this bill. This bill provides that after two years no officer shall or can be retired, because the time limit will have expired.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, can the Senator state the approximate cost to the Government of this bill?

Mr. TYSON. It will cost, for the whole number, $4,985,100 annually.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean the full implication of that statement, does he?

Mr. TYSON. I mean that that is what it will cost to retire all of the officers provided for in this bill who are now 30 per cent or more disabled under the ratings of the United States Veterans' Bureau. Yes; I mean to say that.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that more than 40,000 Reserve Army officers out of the 200,000 have made application for compensation; that more than 10,000 are now upon the active list, which is constantly being added to; that every week the Veterans' Bureau is rerating and reclassifying, as a result of which many who are under 30 per cent disability are advanced to 30 per cent and above, so that progressively the list will increase? Will not this occur that within a few years, if this bill becomes a law, there will be 50,000 officers upon the retired list?

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I am not a prophet, but I can not see why that would be done unless the Congress wants to do it.

Mr. KING. Oh, well, the Senator knows that Congress will yield to appeals that will be made. Any bill that touches the question of the Army or the Navy secures the approval of Congress. This bill has been lobbied for for years, and its supporters are now in the gallery watching us.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I feel that Congress ought to respond whenever a thing is right and just, and only then; and if they are not men enough to refuse to respond when it is not right, then it is for them to say.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily absent on official business.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. NYE] is unavoidably absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not mean to speak more than 20 minutes; I certainly shall try to make my remarks brief.

I am opposed to this bill because, in the first place, it seems to me to be a cruel and indefensible discrimination against the enlisted men of the Army, and against the junior officers, particularly the second lieutenants.

I am opposed to the bill next because it gives compensation not according to the severity of the injury of which the soldier suffered but according to the temporary rank he enjoyed while he was in the Army.

I am opposed to it in the third place because it is an indefensible discrimination between those officers who were injured more than 30 per cent and those who were injured less.

I ask the Senate to bear with me for a moment while I illustrate those discriminations. I realize full well that this bill has been urged upon the Senate by many veterans' organizations, but I say with full confidence that hardly one veteran in one hundred knows what is in this bill, and that any veteran who did know what was in it would oppose it.

I have put that belief to the test at many veterans' meetings, and when I have explained to the veterans gathered what this bill really meant, in the way of discrimination against the enlisted man, I have yet to find a single meeting that was willing to voice any approval of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill.

Let me illustrate. On the 1st day of last July the United States was paying compensation to 243,611 disabled veterans. The bill will favor 3,030. The other 240,000 veterans get no relief under it whatsoever. This establishes a preferred class among the 243,000 veterans and singles them out for special and specially generous relief, not because they are the worst injured but because of their war-time rank.

At present the United States is spending $405,000,000 for veterans' relief. The bill will increase that expenditure less than one-half of 1 per cent. The total increase in cost due to the bill as it has been introduced and reported would be $2,060,000. It is not because I am trying to keep that $2,060,000 from disabled veterans that I am opposing the bill. I would gladly vote for a bill that would grant that increase in relief if it did it impartially to all the men affected or if it gave it to those who were severely injured. The money cost is slight compared with the vast sums that a grateful Nation is pouring out to the disabled veterans.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. KING. I apologize for interrupting the Senator. I do not think the Senator wants to leave the impression that the amount which he has stated as additional cost if the bill passes will be the aggregate amount annually that will in the very near future constitute a charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I agree with the Senator that the probability is the amount will be considerably increased, but in order that I might not be accused of any guesswork I am simply giving the figure that we know will be the immediate increase in cost as certified by the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows there are now more than 10,000 reserve officers on the active list of officers who have applied for compensation——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. KING. And that a large number of them claim more than 30 per cent disability, and that reratings are being made which transfer from a lower percentage of disability to a higher percentage of disability, a considerable number. I am advised that more than 42,000 have applied for compensation, and, of course, a large per cent of that number will come within the 30 per cent provision. Additional officers will apply for disability compensation, and if they reach the 30 per cent limitation they will be transferred to the higher grade and become beneficiaries under the bill. It is, therefore, impossible to predict what in 10 or 15 years from now the additional cost will be to the Government. It may be tens of millions of dollars annually.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That, I believe, is all true, but even that would not stop me if the relief, even in the tens of millions, were going to the men who had given the most for their country during the war. But that is not what the bill does. Will the Senate bear with me while I illustrate those three discriminations?

I said first that the bill discriminates between officers and enlisted men, and that it also discriminates against second lieutenants. It happened that during the war I was a major of Field Artillery. Had I lost two fingers of my right hand, under the provisions of the bill, my compensation would be $2,250 a year. Had a first sergeant of one of my batteries, who had to be every bit as good a man as I, lost the same two fingers, assuming that he had the same occupation as myself, he would get $396 a year. I would get nearly six times as much as he; not because I am a better man, not because I served any better, but simply and only because I was in the Army with a paper which they called a commission, while he was in it with a paper which they called an enlistment contract—and yet this is called a democratic country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator explain what the compensation would be to a Regular officer of the same rank as his own had he lost the same fingers of the right hand?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The probability is he would not have been retired at all, because it would be held that that was not a substantial impairment of his military efficiency. But if he had any injury that retired him, or if he got to be 64 years of age, or if he served 32 years and made application for retirement, then he would get three-quarters of his base pay, whatever that was, and it would depend on the number of years he had been in the Army how much that base pay would be.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is this interesting difference, if the Senator will permit me: The Senator has said he was a major in the Army. Will the Senator tell us how long he served before he became a major?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Everything included, all sorts of preparation together, about three years.

Mr. BINGHAM. He was in the Army for three years before he became a major?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In one form or another.

Mr. BINGHAM. The major in the regular service who becomes disabled enough to be retired, and is retired, has had to have how much service? Can the Senator tell me how many years?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. At present he must have been in service 12 years. In peace times he would probably have to be in the service over 20 years.

Mr. BINGHAM. Or even longer, as we know. If that officer to whom we are referring in the Regular Army had had a temporary commission as major at the front and had been wounded, as the Senator has said, and lost two fingers and had been retired for that injury, he would not be retired with the proportionate pay of a major, because that was only his temporary grade. Majors in the Regular Army at the front nearly all were of the permanent grade of second lieutenant or first lieutenant at the most, as the Senator knows. Their retirement is on the permanent grade which they get for years of service, whereas in this case it is a temporary grade obtained after a few months of service. That is where the great unfairness comes in, in that man to get to be a major or lieutenant colonel in the Regular Army must serve for many years and then be retired and get out, whereas under the provisions of the bill only a few months of service are necessary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It has been represented to me that these men are the only survivors of the World War who have not been taken care of by Congress in the matter of compensation legislation.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The naval officers were taken care of by a rider that went into one of the naval appropriation bills, which nobody knew was there. It was repealed the following year. While it was in effect about half the disabled naval officers learned about it and took advantage of it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it was repealed to the extent that a time limit was fixed under which application could be made for retirement, and the time was fixed so it gave everyone who was injured at that time a chance to take advantage of its provisions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Just a moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. KING. I think the question propounded by the Senator from Minnesota was not quite fully apprehended by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I understand it, but I do not want to get drawn off my trail. I want to put this matter as vividly as I can, and then I shall be glad to go into the details.

Mr. KING. But the Senator's question implied that those who would be the beneficiaries under the pending bill do not receive any compensation, whereas they are now receiving compensation as provided under existing law.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely. They are getting the same compensation now that enlisted men are getting and are graded according to the severity of the injury and the occupation they have. Under the present law, which I think is highly fair, the occupation is taken into account. If a violinist lost a finger on his left hand, his occupation would be gone, but if he were a lawyer, as I, for instance, if I lost that finger,

I would have just one less finger to gesture with. That is the only difference.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to more contrasts that the bill affects. If a lieutenant colonel, we will say, loses one finger, and if his occupation is that of a musician, he is retired at $2,625 a year. But if his brother happens to be an enlisted man, just as good a musician with just as good a show in civil life, and loses the same finger, he gets something like $390 a year as opposed to $2,625. Two men with the same injury in the same occupation who have served with equal bravery are thus discriminated against.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I beg the Senator to let me go on for about five minutes, and then I will yield indefinitely.

If the same major I spoke of a while ago loses two fingers, he gets $2,250 a year, but if his brother, an enlisted man or a second lieutenant, if you please, loses both his legs or has a bullet through his spine that paralyzes him, he gets just one-half as much as the major who loses the two fingers. How can anyone justify that in a country that said it had a democratic Army in a war that was fought for democracy? Then we come back and set up a caste system in the giving of relief. Two fingers, $2,250 a year, and yet a broken back gets $1,200, just because the man who had the broken back was a second lieutenant or a sergeant or a corporal or an enlisted man.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. EDGE. Does not the same condition exist in the Regular Army, where there is a distinction between the enlisted man and the officer?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I have, in the years we have debated this bill for retirement pay, explained over and over again that the retirement pay of a Regular Army officer is deferred pay, saved up year by year, because that officer has given up all other employment and all other ways of laying up for his old age, and he gets it whether he is injured or whether he is 64 years of age or whether he retires voluntarily after a certain service.

Let me give another illustration of the way the pending bill would work out. Out in my town of Pittsburgh lives one of the bravest men I know, who was a second lieutenant during the war, a physician at home, but he went into the fighting forces. He had both of his legs blown off by a shell. At the present time, because of his helplessness, he gets $100 a month for complete disability and he is allowed $50 a month for the employment of an attendant. Under the pending bill, if it were applied to him—and, of course, he would not ask to have it apply to him—he would only get $125 a month, or an actual reduction.

But in my same home town lives another officer who no doubt is a good man. He was a doctor, too. He has diabetes. He never saw the front. He never even saw the ocean. He served here in Washington for about three months. The bill would raise his pay from $100 to $150 a month. That is the way the bill would work.

I have just been working over the rating schedule of the Veterans' Bureau. Let me give another illustration. Two officers, we will say, are majors. They are both scientists. One of them devotes his life to bacteriology and the other one devotes his life to chemistry.

So strange and wonderful are the results of this bill that the major who is a bacteriologist would if he lost his leg at the knee receive $348 a year, while the major who is a chemist, if he lost his leg at the knee, would get $2,250 a year. Justify that to me if you can.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Supposing we concede that to be a case of injustice, is it not perfectly easy for Congress to correct that injustice in the future and make provision so that full justice will be done to everybody?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If Congress will correct it now I shall be glad to vote and work for the bill; but what I object to is the creation of these injustices according to a man's rank.

Mr. BROOKHART. I was not aware that the Senator brought before the committee a bill that would correct the injustices.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I had the honor of writing the World War veterans' act.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; that is all right; that was to pay them part of the damages they suffered by reason of injuries, just as the railroads pay damages for injuries and things of that sort; but that did not relieve this situation and put the emergency officers on an equality with the regular officers who served during the war.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to know, when this bill passes and when the enlisted men of the World War find out what has been done in it, how we are ever going to explain to them the things we have done under the guise of retirement. There was not any essential superiority in the officers who served in the World War that led them to be given commissions. The rank that was given them was for the convenience of command; in order to allow the despot who heads every army to transmit his orders down to every man in the army. That is why rank was given. It was not because there was some social superiority in the officer.

Back in the old days in England men were chosen to be officers of the nation's armed forces by downright purchase, becauses their fathers had the money with which to buy commissions in the army or navy. That was probably the very worst way ever devised for officering an army or a navy. We got away from that, and in our Civil War both Armies officered their troops by appointment of the governors of the States.

Political influence played a considerable part, and the ability to outfit a company or a regiment played a still greater part, as it had done in the War of the Revolution. Men were officers not because they bought their commissions directly but because they contributed for the arms and the accouterments of the troops they commanded. In the Spanish-American War we made a little further improvement, but it was not until the World War that we got down to a proper democratic basis of making officers. In that war commissions were obtained not because of the wealth of a man or because he had bought a commission from somebody else or because he had bought the outfit for a troop or a company or a battery, but because he seemed to have the qualities or the knack that enabled him to function effectively. If he was an accomplished typewriter expert, he might have been put in the Quartermaster Department buying typewriters; but that did not mean that he was any better than the enlisted man at the front. If he happened to be able to do trigonometry in his head easily, he probably became an officer of the Field Artillery; but that did not make him any better man than the enlisted man who served under him. All through the war we prided ourselves on the democracy of this army. It was the first time we had had a truly democratic army.

When the war was over and we began to take steps for the relief of those who were maimed in it, it was a matter of pride for those of us who had to do with the veterans' relief legislation that temporary rank was not considered at all. The men were considered as equals. Any private was the equal of his general when it came to the reception of the gratitude of his Nation for the suffering that he had undergone. That is what this bill discards. The objection to it is not the $2,000,000 that it will cost; the serious thing is the loss of respect that it costs.

How dare we in America set up an aristocracy like this? How dare we pick 3,000 men out of the 243,000 and give them special benefits, as if they were somehow the social superiors of the enlisted men whom we disdain? I can not believe any veterans' organization, knowing what is in the bill, could ever sponsor it for one minute. I can not believe that any enlisted men, knowing that they are ignored while others are given these astounding benefits for trivial injuries, could ever approve the passage of the bill.

An enlisted man with both eyes out will receive only half as much as will be given under this bill to an officer for the loss of two fingers.

What are we going to say to that blind enlisted man? How are we going to explain to him that his two eyes are only worth half as much as an officer's two fingers? How are we going to explain it to the second lieutenant who led his men at the front and is given a maximum of only $100 a month for the paralysis that followed the bullet through his spine, when some officer in the Quartermaster Department or in the Judge Advocate General's Department who served, perhaps, a month here in Washington and ran the risk of no greater danger than that of indigestion, but who five years afterwards may have developed insanity or tuberculosis, which the law provides conclusively shall be considered due to his war service, because of the constructive disability or insanity subsequently accruing is given twice what is allowed to the paralyzed man who served at the front? How can you do it, Senators? How can you justify it? How can you say that America has no classes when you differentiate amongst men not according to what the war has done to them, not according to the degree to which their bodies have been wrecked by their war-time experiences, but according to whether the particular commission they held was that of second lieutenant or colonel? It seems to me that this is the worst departure from that democracy on which we prided ourselves that has ever been suggested to the Congress since the war ended.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GLASS. I should be interested to know whether the striking inequalities suggested by the Senator are exceptional, or will they manifest themselves in great numbers?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, Mr. President, I could go on, if the Senate would bear with me, and I could give hundreds and hundreds of such illustrations. I have purposely not given too many, but this book of occupational ratings, containing thousands of ratings, points out many discriminations. If the Senator would like—this bill will probably come up for consideration again to-morrow—I will give a collection of them. What I have given are merely illustrative cases.

I have in my mind a list of officers from Pennsylvania who would be benefited by this bill. If it will not delay the Senate too long, I should like to give just a few illustrations culled from this list. I do not want to give the names because I do not believe that it is justifiable to advertise by name the particular injuries of certain men, because it might prejudice them in their communities. I can give all the other information that is necessary.

Mr. GLASS. I will not ask the Senator to do that. The illustrations which he gave were of such a striking nature that I wondered whether there were a great many of them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President, I can truthfully say there are thousands and tens of thousands of them.

Mr. EDGE and Mr. TYSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think the Senator from New Jersey first asked me to yield.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, my question is a very short one. As I followed the Senator's argument and reasoning, he was pointing out the very decided discrepancies that would exist—and they are decided; there is no question about that—under the terms of this bill. It is reasonable to assume that the Senator would like to see those discrepancies eliminated by including noncommissioned officers and enlisted men in the benefits of this measure?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We could not include them within the benefits of the proposed act by basing their compensation on the pay they received in the Army. If we should give them three-fourths of their pay, it would not amount to anything substantial, because their pay in money was very low. Their compensation included their keep in every way; it included all sorts of things that the officer did not get; so that the sergeant actually received a larger pay in many cases than did the second lieutenant. So we could not base the compensation of the noncommissioned officers and enlisted men on their pay and do justice.

Mr. EDGE. Their compensation could be based perhaps on some method that could be arrived at, disregarding the extra allowances to which the Senator refers.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It ought to be based on the man's injury and on the occupation which that injury affects, just as the present veteran's law does. If we are going to be generous to men who have lost both eyes, for example, let us be equally generous to all of them whether they held commissions or not. The determining question should be how badly they were injured.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. I should like to ask the Senator if he is in favor of retirement for the Regular Army?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am.

Mr. TYSON. And is the Senator in favor of pensions for enlisted men in the Regular Army?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am.

Mr. TYSON. Why does the Senator not take the same attitude in the case of the Regular Army that he takes in the case of the emergency officers and men of the Army that went through the World War? Why is it not just as proper and right if we are proceeding on the democratic principles of which the Senator has spoken to have the private soldier in the Regular Army receive the same retired pay, under like conditions, that the Regular Army officer receives when he is retired?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If it comes to a pension, I think he ought to get the same.

Mr. TYSON. That is not the question. The Senator has said that officers and enlisted men of the emergency army for like disabilities should receive the same compensation. What is the difference between the Regular Army officer and the enlisted man of the Regular Army? They are both human beings. Why should the Regular Army officer be paid so much more than the enlisted man of the Regular Army is paid for like disabilities?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator is talking about pensions, I fully agree that there ought to be no difference. If the Senator is talking about the compensation for injuries, I agree there ought to be no difference; absolutely none.

Mr. TYSON. The Senator knows that the Regular Army officer does not have to have any particular injury. So long as he is so far disabled that he can not perform the duties of his office, he is retired.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; or if he is 64 years old he is retired.

Mr. TYSON. I should like to ask the Senator another question. He was speaking about the long period that Regular Army officers have to serve before they may retire and receive retired pay. A graduate of West Point is given his diploma to-day and breaks his leg going down to the dock to get on a boat to come to Washington. What is done to him?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. He is taken to a hospital and kept in the service.

Mr. TYSON. But if he is unable to perform active duty after a time he is placed on the retired list and receives retired pay as a second lieutenant just the same as any officer who has served long years. How does the Senator account for that?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator is a distinguished soldier. He knows the reasons for retired pay.

Mr. TYSON. I know that it is just and right that it should be done. It is the public policy of this country; and you can not have an army unless you do have a policy of that kind. My idea about it is that unless we have a policy of that kind we never will have a good army ready to go into any other war, just as we have never had an Army ready to go into any war that this country has ever had to wage.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And the Senator thinks it is justice to pay the major who is a chemist $2,250 a year, and the major who is a bacteriologist $348 a year, when each of them has lost a leg at the knee?

Mr. TYSON. If they come within the provisions of this bill I think each of them ought to have the pay that this bill would give to him.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Exactly. I am just showing what this bill does do to him. The bacteriologist with his leg off gets $29 a month.

Mr. TYSON. If he has the service and if he has the disability and if he has the rank and was injured in the World War, I would pay him just what this bill provides for paying him.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is all I care to say to-day, Mr. President; but between now and to-morrow I will make a collection of some of these typical injustices.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I was thinking along the same lines, evidently, that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was thinking when he asked his question. I am not quite satisfied with the Senator's answer to it. The question arose in my mind whether these discrepancies necessarily followed in all cases, and, if not, in what proportion of them. I have gotten the idea now from the Senator's statement and his address that there is a discrepancy in every case. Are these illustrations fair samples?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think they are fair samples.

Mr. NORRIS. Could there be a case under the bill now, if it became a law, where there would not be a discrepancy?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, there will be some cases where we will be glad to see the compensation paid, because some majors were severely injured.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. I do not know, however, that the Senator understands my point. I do not know that I have made myself clear. That does not answer the question that I am trying to propound.

I want to know whether this bill always makes a discrimination in favor of an emergency officer who is injured the same as a private soldier or a noncommissioned officer.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In every case except the second lieutenants. The second lieutenant gets no benefit under this bill unless he is lightly injured. A seriously injured second lieutenant gets less under this bill than he would get under the present law. In every other case the discrimination exists.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I am frank to say that I came in just when he was making his statement about one major getting $300 and another getting $2,900. In what way did that difference arise?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The difference arose in this way: The bill extends the retirement privilege only to officers who are injured 30 per cent or more. If they are injured only 29 per cent, under these rating schedules they do not get any benefit under the bill. Under the rating schedules a bacteriologist—to continue that illustration; I could give hundreds of others—a bacteriologist who loses his leg at the knee is held to be 29 per cent disabled. Therefore he gets only $29 per month—29 per cent of the $100 which goes for complete disability—while if a chemist loses his leg at the knee he is held to be 34 per cent disabled, and so he gets $2,250 a year.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who made this rating?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The rating schedule is made by the Veterans' Bureau in compliance with the law of Congress.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not the Veterans' Bureau need to be seen by a bacteriologist to make it see how unreasonable that sort of a rating is?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think, on the whole, the rating schedule is very satisfactory.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why does it not injure a bacteriologist as much as a chemist to lose his leg at the knee?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I presume that one sits down and the other stands up. I do not know the reason.

Mr. CARAWAY. I believe that the Senator is not, either, because I rather think he would find out that they perform their occupations in somewhat the same way.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It occurred to me that they did, and that is why I took them for an illustration.

Mr. CARAWAY. I rather think that is the fault of the Veterans' Bureau and not of the legislation of Congress.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, do the same striking inequalities prevail in the Regular Army?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; Mr. President. In the Regular Army we have the enlisted retired list and the commissioned retired list; and that is based on length of service, not on degree of injury or anything of the sort, in both cases.

Mr. GLASS. Not on rank?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is based on rank and length of service and the pay period in which each individual is at the time of his retirement. He may be retired for age; he may be retired on his voluntary application; he may be retired for disability. There is no resemblance between that system, which applies in peace time as well as war time, and the system here, which is distinctly war-time relief for injury.

Between now and to-morrow morning I will try to collect a large number of these illustrative contrasts. As I say, there would be no trouble, except for the time, in giving a thousand of them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I know that he has given very great study to this measure.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why could not these inequalities be corrected in the very language of the bill, so that the retirement would be made as just to the emergency officer as to the Regular Army officer?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Because the two are based on wholly different principles.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know; but that is the thing I have in my mind. Why can we not provide that if an emergency officer is disabled he shall receive compensation just as if he had been in the Regular Establishment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We could say that. That is what this bill does.

Mr. CARAWAY. But under its administration, as the Senator apprehends that it will be administered, the very glaring inequalities that have been mentioned creep out. Why can not the language be changed so that Congress will do just what it intends to do—give the emergency officer exactly the same advantages under the retirement provisions of this bill that the Regular Army officer gets under the law that governs the retirement of those in the Regular Establishment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. To the extent that the officer is 30 per cent disabled, the bill does do that; but that is what creates the inequalities that I have been trying to point out.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to answer the question of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. TYSON. I will state that the Senator will remember that that was what was desired and what we made an effort to do in the first instance. We tried to get this bill so fixed that they should have the same privileges and be retired under the same conditions as officers of the Regular Army. That was opposed by the War Department.

Mr. CARAWAY. We are not particularly concerned with that. I have never been tremendously impressed by what the departments wanted, because I have not found in the heads of departments any superior intelligence as compared with other intelligent people. If the Senator can make his language do that particular thing, why does not the Senator do it? It would not cost the bill a vote in the Senate, because the people who are going to vote for this bill are going to do it without very much concern about what the head of the War Department wants.

In fact, I am frank to say that I have never been quite able to comprehend why the Regular Establishment are so jealously and zealously for the retirement rights and seniority rights given them, and yet are so unalterably opposed to having other men enjoy the same benefits who have faced the same dangers and incurred the same injuries. If the Senator can make his bill prevent the inequalities that are here pointed out, why not do that?

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I wish to state that this is a bill that was in the Senate before, and I have introduced it here just as it was introduced before. I have not made any changes, because I thought this was a bill that was satisfactory to the Senate, and it seemed that it was a fair bill under all the circumstances.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, pardon me just one second. If we are legislating to do for the emergency officer exactly what the law does for the officers of the Regular Establishment, then I would make the bill do it without any reference to whether it met or did not meet the approval of whoever might now be the Secretary of War. I have high personal regard for the present Secretary, but I would not be willing to surrender my judgment on a question of right or wrong to the judgment of anybody else, whether he be the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas—probably this is not an answer to his question at all—that following the Civil War, and from time to time, many able men attempted to place the volunteer officers on the same plane as the regular officers; and it was opposed, and is opposed to this day. A large number of the surviving officers of the Civil War have not had the retirement privilege; and, though bills for the purpose have been brought up from time to time from 1866 down to 1912 or 1914, so far as I can recall every Secretary of War has opposed them, and most of the volunteer officers themselves have opposed them. They felt that it was unjust to the Regular Army officer who gave up his life to the Army service not to give him some advantages that were denied to those who had just gone in temporarily and had gone back again to the civil activities of life.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I just say this: I can not be thought to be hostile to the Regular service. I have two boys in West Point. I necessarily entertain no prejudice against the Regular Establishment; but when a boy gets an education that costs the Government about twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars, I am at a loss to know why he has been very seriously disadvantaged in the race of life because he has gone through West Point. When some man who has had to fight his way for his education gives up his place in society, whatever it may be, high or low, lays down all the opportunities of civil life, goes into the Army, carries himself with courage and patriotism through the struggle, and is disabled, I think he is just as patriotic and just as much entitled to consideration as if he has worn the uniform all his life.

I do not think it is a disadvantage to a man to have been an Army officer. I think that in this bill we treat them very well indeed. I do not know any of them that do not find it a very pleasant calling. I do not think the Regular Army officer is at a disadvantage, and I do not think he is entitled to any consideration to which the emergency officer is not entitled.

That is the way it seems to me; and I hope the law will be amended. The fact that justice has not been done to the Civil War emergency officers, if that is the case, has no weight at all in this matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the fact is that emergency officers would not be satisfied if they were treated exactly as regular officers were treated who were injured during the World War; for a regular officer during the World War who was badly injured and retired receives the retired pay not of the rank that he had when he was wounded but the retired pay of the permanent rank which he had earned by many years in the Army.

As a matter of fact, if this bill shall pass, it will do a great injustice to the regular officer, for a lieutenant colonel of the Regular Army serving alongside of a lieutenant colonel of the emergency forces, and wounded the same way and retired does not receive the retired pay of a lieutenant colonel of the Regular Army, but only the retired pay of his rank, which probably was that of captain at the time.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is based upon the theory that a number of officers were serving with temporary commissions in grades above their regular grades. That does not comprise a very large class of officers up to the company rank, at least. That would only become a condition that might prevail when they come to the regimental officers.

Mr. BINGHAM. There were very few regular officers of company grade during the war. Nearly all the regular officers were of field grade or higher.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Some recent graduates of West Point were serving as majors in France.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose they had been injured.

Mr. BINGHAM. They would have been retired as second lieutenants. The Regular Army does not retire an officer at the temporary grade he was holding at the time he was wounded. Consequently if you were to treat the emergency officers in the same way as Regular Army officers, and retire them at their permanent grades, they would not have any standing at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Many of the regular officers, however, even when they were retired, were advanced a grade or two or three grades.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the Regular Army?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; frequently we would promote a man to a certain grade and retire him the next day in that grade.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That would have no effect on his pay.

Mr. CARAWAY. He is paid according to his grade when he is retired.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; but my impression is that the pay of a retired major general, for instance, is the same as that of a lieutenant colonel, given the same period of service.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am frank to say that I am not familiar with the pay of the various officers in the Regular Army. I do know that in the committee from which this bill comes there are Senators who oppose it, and they can write into this language a provision that will do exact justice.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; that is not possible, because if you agree that when a great war comes and we have a great Army, consisting of volunteer enlisted men and volunteer officers, the difference between the officer and the enlisted man is only a temporary difference. It is not a life difference.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not agree on this question of difference.

Mr. BINGHAM. The officer or enlisted man ought to be compensated in accordance with the injury he receives and its effect on his earning power.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why should there be any retired pay for an officer in the Regular Establishment, except based upon his disability?

Mr. BINGHAM. There is none except based upon his disability or his age.

Mr. CARAWAY. Upon age and disability. But he is certain of his retirement pay when he goes out of the service if it is for an injury, or if it is on account of age he goes out with the certainty of his retirement. If we come down to that, what difference does it make whether he had been working for the Government all his life or whether he had been earning his living as a private citizen?

I do not think there is any aristocracy in this country, and that because a man is a member of the Army or the Navy he is any better than a man who is a seller of dry goods or who follows the plow; the Government does not owe him any more.

It took no more patriotism upon his part to follow his occupation than it did for the other man to follow his. I take it for granted that either one of those men is perfectly willing to expose himself in defense of his country. I do not think anybody ever saw any difference between an emergency officer and a regular officer in courage, in desire to do his duty, in his willingness to lay down his life, or to be injured in defense of his country. That is common. The enlisted man carried on with as much apparent desire to do his duty as did the highest officer in the Army.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no question about that; but I should like to call the Senator's attention to certain definite facts based on figures furnished by the Veterans' Bureau.

It seems to me that we have in this country established a system of compensation that is better than that established in any other country. I will say to the Senator that Canada has adopted a system which is what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] wants us to adopt. The Canadians pay a man who was injured in accordance with his rank. If he was a corporal, he gets so much for an injury; if he was a sergeant, he gets a little more; if he was a second lieutenant, he gets a little more, and so on up to major general.

With us we have handled the matter in an entirely different way. We compensate a man, not in accordance with the rank he might have achieved in the Army, either in the noncommissioned force or in the commissioned force; but we compensate him in proportion to his injury, and how it affects his ability to earn in his old trade or occupation.

For instance, there are many different classifications according to occupation. I have before me only the figures for a half dozen of those—such as lawyer, farmer, bookkeeper, mason, physician, salesman, cashier.

If a veteran has lost the lower two-thirds of one leg, those who have studied this matter and have established rules in the Veterans' Bureau say that that affects him according to his occupation. If he were a lawyer, the rating is 29 per cent In other words, he is considered 29 per cent disabled, and under our present law he receives $29 a month compensation for his disability.

If, on the other hand, it was a farmer who was injured, the Senator can readily understand that to lose the lower two-thirds of one leg would affect him far more than it would if he were a lawyer. His rating is 55 per cent, and he gets for the rest of his life $55 a month.

Suppose this lawyer had been fortunate enough to secure a commission as major and this bill passes. He is still a lawyer. According to the best judgment in the matter, he is injured only 29 per cent, and if he had been an enlisted man or an officer he would get only $29 a month. But if he had been a farmer he would get $187.50 a month.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The question I would like to have the Senator answer is this: Here is a man who is an Army officer. The Government has paid him a salary for a number of years before a war comes on. As the Senator knows, the United States pay very excellent salaries, better salaries than any other government in the world, to our Army officers. This man is wounded, and after the war is over he is given retirement pay automatically.

Here is another man who is in civil life, and who trains himself; the Government does not train him, but he trains himself in such a way as to fit him to become an officer; a war comes on, and he goes into the Army as an officer, just as a Regular Army officer does. He is wounded. The war is over, and this man gets such pay as the Senator suggests, vastly less than the Regular Army officer.

Why should our Government make a distinction between these two classes of officers? Both having done their duty, both having gone into the Army, both having risked their lives and suffered wounds, why should the Government give to one perhaps twice as much as to the other? I can not understand it. It seems to me that we ought to treat the emergency officer in exactly the same fair, just way that we treat the regular officer.

Mr. BINGHAM. But this bill does not propose to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. This bill does propose to do that. It puts them on exactly the same retirement pay.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no, Mr. President, it does not do so. I knew a case in the Regular Army of a man whose regular commission was that of first lieutenant, but he was promoted to a colonel, went to France, and served as colonel in the Regular Army. Had he been wounded seriously and retired, he would not get the retired pay of a colonel but of a first lieutenant. This bill would give to the emergency officer who was wounded as a colonel the retired pay of a colonel. The Senator can not tell me that that is the same treatment.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is substantially the same.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, indeed; not at all. The difference between the pay of a first lieutenant and that of a colonel is quite considerable. The difference is 100 per cent. The retired pay of a first lieutenant is $125 per month; that of a colonel is 100 per cent more, or $250 per month. Furthermore, the retired pay of a seriously wounded first lieutenant is very little different from that which he would receive under the regular compensation now arranged; only $25 more per month.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Referring to the discrimination which the Senator just mentioned, should we deny justice to the emergency officer altogether when we could easily correct that very discrimination, and give to the Regular Army officer, wounded in war, the same rating we give to the civilian officer? That is not an objection to the bill. These discriminations are coming up before the Military Affairs Committee all the time. We are working out new amendments to the law constantly to remove those discriminations, and the same would be done under this bill if these things develop.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no doubt that if this bill shall pass there will be many amendments to it, and many more thousands of officers will come under it than would at present come under it. As a matter of fact, when this bill was first considered in the House in its present form, the testimony, in February, 1922, before the committee of the House was that it would affect only 895 officers, and probably not as many as that, because it was said that some of them had died since December, 1921, when the figures were obtained.

Two years later, in December, 1923, when the bill came up, it was found that the number had increased to 1,018, and the argument was advanced that it was for only 1,000 officers, so why not let them have it. Two years later, in 1925, when it came up again, the number had nearly doubled, being 1,986. Two years later, in December, 1927, when the bill came up again, the number had increased to 3,050. In other words, in the six years since December, 1921, the number has increased from 895 to 3,050, and, of course, it will go on increasing. In justice to the disabled officers concerned, it will certainly seem as though it will be the only fair thing to do. Although the public through the newspapers has been given the impression that this bill is intended to do justice to all the disabled emergency officers, I would like to call the Senator's attention to the tables printed in the RECORD for March 10, on pages 4451 and 4452, which show that the measure provides for only a small number of the disabled officers, less than one-third, and that there are 7,000 disabled emergency officers who will not be benefited in the least by this bill.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], if I may have his attention for a moment, asked some time ago whether there were a large number of cases where the difference would be striking. It occurs to me to call his attention to the fact that of enlisted men who are rated as totally disabled permanently, and who therefore receive $100 a month, there are 31,784. There are 31,784 totally disabled who get only $100 a month, but this bill proposes to give far more than that, sometimes twice as much, to hundreds of officers who are far from totally disabled.

For instance, may I call the Senator's attention to some Government employees who are on the emergency officers' list and are disabled. I have been unable to get the figures from some of the Government departments, but succeeded in getting them from the Veterans' Bureau. I should like to put this table in the RECORD, for I believe it will interest Senators to see how it works out in practice. For instance, here is a former captain who receives a salary from the Government of $6,200. His disability amounts to 33 per cent, so that at present, in addition to his salary of $6,200 a year, he gets $396 a year to compensate him for his disability. The bill would increase that to $1,800, increasing his monthly allowance from $33 to $150 or about 400 per cent.

Mr. KING. And he would still get his salary.

Mr. BINGHAM. And he would still be able to earn his salary of $6,200.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD at this point the table to which I referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANSDELL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Number	Name and address	Rank	Salary	Extent of disability (partial permanent)	Amount of monthly compensation	Amount of monthly compensation if Tyson-Fitzgerald bill becomes law

Mr. TYSON and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. Just a moment, please. I would like to give three of these instances before I am interrupted.

Here is a major who is able to earn from the Government $5,200 a year. His disability is rated at 40 per cent. He has a mild case of heart trouble. He receives to-day $40 a month, but under the bill he would receive, in addition to his salary of $5,200 a year, $2,270, an increase in his compensation from $40 a month to $187.50 a month.

Here is a colonel whose disability amounts to 31 per cent. He is earning in the Veterans' Bureau a salary of $3,000. He is receiving compensation of $372 a year. Under the terms of the pending bill that would be increased to $3,000 a year. In other words, it would double his salary.

I have before me the record of a captain in the emergency list who is serving his Government at a salary of $10,000 a year. He has a gunshot wound and his disability rating is 30 per cent. He gets now $30 a month in addition to his $10,000 salary. The bill would give him $187.50 a month, or $2,250 per year. There is another one here in the list who is getting a $10,000 a year salary and who now receives, under a rating of 39 per cent, $39 a month. Under the terms of the pending bill he would receive $125 per month.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. How much would the enlisted man get if he had both eyes shot out?

Mr. BINGHAM. Only $100 a month.

Mr. TYSON. Is it not $200 a month?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me now?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I seem to recall that repeatedly efforts were made after the Civil War to provide that a man should not have a pension who in civil life was receiving as much as $5,000 or $10,000 a year. But that was never done, as they regarded the compensation from the Government as a badge of honor. I do not think a man who is receiving a salary from his Government of $10,000 ought to accept compensation. I think the badge of honor would be on the other end of the proposition.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator tell us in what branch of the Government those men are employed?

Mr. BINGHAM. The first cases I gave were in the Veterans' Bureau. The other cases are Members of Congress.

Mr. GLASS. I have made some inquiry to-day because I occupy the distressing position of the man referred to in Scripture, who is sworn to his own hurt and changes not. In other words, upon the face of the case the appeal to a Senator of giving the same fair treatment to the emergency officer who risked his life for his country as is given to an officer in the Regular Army seems pretty just. Upon that repeated appeal to me from various posts I have agreed to vote for the bill. Yet I am very much disturbed by some of the arguments presented against the bill. I particularly wanted to know whether the striking inequalities presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania were exceptional or whether they were general or whether they might not be cured by an amendment of some sort to the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. As one goes over the list of emergency officers who are 30 per cent or more disabled, one finds a considerable number of cases of very mild disability, yet where the increase in pay is considerable. For instance, here is a man suffering from hernia. His disability is rated at 34 per cent. As an enlisted man he would get $34 a month the rest of his life or until the doctors changed the rating either by reducing it, eliminating it if he got entirely well, or by increasing it if necessary. Under this bill his compensation is increased to $125 a month permanently for the rest of his life, even though he gets well.

So one might go on indefinitely. I have several thousands of cases before me, but I shall not now take the time of the Senate to go over them. I do want to go back for a moment to the different ratings and show the Senate how fairly the ratings are now administered.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. The Senator was speaking just a moment ago about officers ending up in being on the retired list. Is not that just as true in the Regular Army to-day as it is among the emergency officers?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not know how many times one has to state what appear to be the simple facts, that retired pay in the Regular Army for an officer is a part of the contract which the Government enters into with him when he is originally commissioned, and that retired pay for a regular officer does not depend on the rank he has in battle when he gets his wound nor on the nature of his wound. It depends on the number of years he has served. It depends on the length of time he has been a faithful officer. If he has served 30 years and has become a colonel, he has accumulated a large amount of equity in retirement pay and he gets a large retirement pay—$250 per month. If he has served only four or five years as a second lieutenant and is wounded in battle, even though he may have been temporarily promoted in rank to a colonelcy, he gets the retirement pay of a second lieutenant, or $93.75 per month. But under the terms of the bill, even though a man may have served here in Washington but a week before the armistice and acquired tuberculosis since then and gets a 30 per cent rating of disability, as many of us easily could, if he had had luck enough to get a commission as lieutenant colonel he would get for the rest of his life $225 a month instead of $30 a month.

I know how many of these commissions were given. I had the honor of serving during the entire war. A part of the time I was in the personnel department of the Air Service. I do not want to tell unpleasant stories. I know that thousands of officers earned their commissions right down to the last inch and deserved far higher commissions than they got. That was particularly true in the Air Service. Officers who came into the Air Service in the latter part of the war as flyers got commissions only as second lieutenants.

It was almost impossible to get any promotion for those men in France, no matter what they did. I know, because in 1918 I was over there in the personnel office. It was almost impossible to get any flyers promoted. Many of those boys were seriously wounded and are now receiving the compensation which the Government thinks is right, bearing in mind what their previous occupation was. Not one of those seriously wounded cases among the Air Corps second lieutenants will be benefited under the terms of the pending bill. They will have to proceed without the privilege of going on the retired list, or else take the $6.25 less which retirement under this bill gives them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, is it not true there were several branches of the service in which there were no officers commissioned as second lieutenants, but they started either as first lieutenants or captains?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true, and there were many officers in the latter part of the war who were lucky enough to come here to Washington and get commissions as majors when, if they had been a little more ambitious and had gone in during the first days of the war, they would only have gotten commissions as first or second lieutenants. I know a doctor who was very patriotic, saw the war coming on, and got a commission at the very beginning of the war. He was a very able physician. He was commissioned as a first lieutenant and was finally promoted toward the end of the war to a captaincy. I know another doctor who served alongside of him in the same town who was a little slower coming in. He finally went in as a major.

The same thing happened in the Air Service. There were men who came in at the beginning of the war, like Victor Pagé, one of the ablest aeronautical engineers of the country, who were willing to come in at the beginning. In accordance with the rules then, he received only a first lieutenant's commission. Finally he was promoted twice, until he became a major. We became more liberal later and other engineers coming in toward the end of the war were given commissions as majors. There was so much luck about it that it seems perfectly outrageous to compensate a man's disabilities in accordance with his temporary rank, rather than according to what he suffered and the way it affects his earning ability, as we do to-day under the very able bill fathered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator how he accounts for this fact. The selective service act of May 17, 1917, provided in section 10 that—

> All officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects upon the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pension as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, Mr. President; I have heard that before. I will say to the Senator that if we were to carry out that provision not one of these emergency officers would get on the retired list, because none of them had a permanent grade. The Senator knows just as well as I do that the officers who were retired from the Regular Army after the World War were retired as of their permanent grade and not of the grade in which they served. If then they are to be "in all respects upon the same footing * * * as officers * * * in the Regular Army" they would not be retired as of the grade in which they served in the World War, because Regular officers were not so retired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Connecticut does not wish to proceed further this afternoon. So I am going to ask for an executive session at this time, and the Senator can continue his speech to-morrow if he desires.

Mr. BINGHAM. That will be satisfactory to me.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 15, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, a thousand years in Thy sight are as yesterday when they are past! Persuade us that we must lay out our life plan on the scale of the infinite. May we lean on faith, for Thou art our eternal refuge. We are silent and bewildered in the presence of this fresh disaster which has befallen that fragrant land beneath our western skies. O help us to believe that God reigns; and though clouds and darkness are about Him, yet righteousness and truth are the habitations of His throne. Thou who didst weep beside the grave and whose tears fell at the sight of the burdened crowd, have mercy and give pity; do not leave the strickened ones comfortless. Take them in the ample folds of Thy love. Grant strength and courage to the living, peace to the dying, and eternal life to the departed. O Father of mercy, revive the fainting hearts, give vigor to the falling hands, and heavenly hope to the worn step and the wearied workers' stroke. In the name of our blessed Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PHILIPPINE SUGAR

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, on February 23 I introduced a joint resolution providing for the restoration of a limit on the importation into this country of free sugar from the Philippine Islands and limiting the amount to 500,000 long tons annually. At some future time I desire to discuss that resolution and the necessity for its adoption. At the present time, however, I desire to read an editorial from the Washington Post of Sunday, March 11, 1928, which very clearly and convincingly sets forth the importance and necessity for the action proposed. I read:

[Editorial from the Washington Post, Sunday, March 11, 1928]

WAR, AND NO SUGAR

Governor General Stimson, upon his arrival at Manila, has stated that he is "opposed to anything which could possibly restrict the agricultural development of the Philippines. He had reference to the proposal to restrict to 500,000 tons annually the free importation of Philippine sugar into the United States. But he added that "the islands are capable of producing many farm products now unknown here, and I intend to encourage diversified farming and give the people the varied interests which I believe will result in enhanced prosperity, eventually making possible industrialization."

The enormous profit in sugar making, made possible by free entry of the product into the American market, has a tendency to confine the Philippines to a single product. This is not a healthy tendency, either for the Philippines or for the United States. At the rate of increased production of sugar it will not be many years before the United States will be dependent upon Philippine sugar. It is driving out its competitors, including domestic beet sugar, Hawaiian cane sugar, and Cuban cane sugar. Thus, unless the tendency to overproduce this single crop in the Philippines is checked, the United States will find itself compelled in case of war to guard a 7,000-mile avenue through which to procure a necessity of life.

The authorities charged with the duty of planning for the defense of the United States are doing their utmost to make this country self-sustaining. They are laying out methods for developing chemicals, metals, minerals, woods, and other raw materials so that when war comes the United States will not be cut off from its necessary supplies. In the meantime, through a mistaken policy of excessive generosity toward the Philippines, Congress is destroying the domestic and near-by sources of sugar, which is as indispensable as any war matériel.

Congress should make a liberal allowance for the production of Philippine sugar by permitting its importation free of duty, but beyond a certain point a duty should be imposed. The limit commonly deemed to be just to all concerned is 500,000 tons a year. The islands are not exporting that quantity to the United States at present, but they are rapidly increasing their output, at the expense of producers in the United States, Hawaii, and Cuba. Governor Stimson's plans for diversification of production in the islands will fail so long as sugar is admitted free into the United States in unlimited quantities. A large quota of the Navy will be needed to protect this commerce in time of war, whether the United States be a neutral or a belligerent.

It is not prudent to create such a state of affairs, as a matter of self-defense, and it is not conducive of prosperity in the Philippines to make the people dependent upon a single crop. Congress should impose a reasonable limitation upon the free entry of Philippine sugar.

[Applause.]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—LOBBYISTS

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, some time ago I introduced a resolution calculated to discourage the practice of ex-Members of Congress representing any interest for pay in the capacity of lobbyists on the floor of either House or in the Capitol Building. I had no particular gentleman in mind when I introduced that resolution. I had read daily reports in the newspapers about the successful lobbying practices of those gentlemen who were opposing a certain senatorial investigation, but I want you to believe that I had no particular person in mind when I introduced the resolution.

However, a gentleman by the name of Lenroot, who formerly sat in this House, and afterwards sat for a term in the Senate, and was retired for good and sufficient reasons, appears to have absorbed the notion that my resolution was directed specifically toward him. He submits to a long interview in the Baltimore Sun, and in that interview he describes himself as a rather corpulent, blond-haired gentleman, and insists that it is very unhappy for him to vision that blond-haired gentleman in the attitude of buttonholing Members of either body on the floor and drawing them into a corner to whisper to them something in behalf of or in opposition to legislation favored or opposed by certain big business interests.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I rise only for the purpose of asking you and my colleagues to believe that I did not introduce that resolution with special reference to Lenroot. I can illustrate his attitude by recalling an experience of my own in boyhood. I had been permitted to have a new shotgun, and I got up very early one morning and hastened out with it, because I had been told by some other boys that very early in the morning I might get a shot at some wild ducks on a little pond near the village. I arrived at the pond before daylight and waited patiently for the coming of the ducks. Just as day was breaking a couple of wild ducks circled over me and lighted on the pond. I could not see distinctly from my hiding place, but I sneaked around to a point where I came into good shooting distance. I had seen only two ducks, but now I saw three of them on the pond, so I just blazed away at the flock, first with one barrel and then with the other. I killed every duck on the pond. I ran down to the water to pick up my prize, and there I found three dead ducks, two of them dark colored wild ducks, and one of them was a large blond-colored duck. A few days later one of our neighbors brought suit against my father for the value of the blond tame duck which I had killed. Father was neither a lawyer nor a lobbyist, but he pleaded with the judge that it was not my fault that the large blond tame duck had been killed, because I did not know the blond tame duck was on the pond, my only desire being to shoot wild ducks. My father further argued to the court that it was not my fault that the large blond tame duck was killed, for, indeed, no large blond tame duck had any business sporting with wild ducks. The learned judge was profound in the law and in knowledge of ducks, and promptly he decided that I might go hence without day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Committee on Agriculture may exchange places so far as to-day's business is concerned; in other words, allow the Committee on Agriculture to use to-day, which belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and then allow the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to use one day that will belong to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Was not that within the agreement made last week?

Mr. TILSON. No. The agreement made last week was simply to allow the Committee on Agriculture to use a part of that one day belonging to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. SNELL. Without reference to future days?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I had gotten the impression that it was a part of the agreement then made that the program the gentleman now suggests be carried out.

Mr. TILSON. We had that in mind, but it has not been approved by the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether there is any danger of the appointment of a new Secretary of Agriculture as the result of this exchange of places?

Mr. CLARKE. Not since the firebrand was plucked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may be permitted to-day to give way to the Committee on Agriculture without losing any of its rights. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. And also to take one day of the time allotted to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. ASWELL. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that it is likely the Committee on Agriculture will not have sufficient business to occupy the day. In that event, what will happen? I think what we have should be operated on in a few minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Well, if that is the case, then we will proceed to something else. To-day will count as one of the days of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. ASWELL. This will count as one full day for the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; it will count as a full day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would it be agreeable to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to go on after the Committee on Agriculture has completed its business?

Mr. PARKER. We can not do that.

Mr. ASWELL. We have a number of bills that do not amount to much.

Mr. TILSON. Sometimes bills that do not amount to much take a good deal of time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention to have the Committee on Foreign Affairs proceed after the Committee on Agriculture completes its work?

Mr. TILSON. No. That committee will be reached in its turn.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I understand that after the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it is the turn of the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. TILSON. No; I think that is not correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's understanding is that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will have the call next Wednesday.

Mr. TILSON. That is the understanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I would like my question disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. TILSON. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. BLACK of New York. If the Committee on Agriculture does not take the entire day, will the Committee on Foreign Affairs have the remainder of the day?

Mr. TILSON. No; the Committee on Foreign Affairs will not be reached to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. GEORGE C. PEERY

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD an address delivered by my colleague from Virginia [Mr. PEERY] at Bristol, Va., on February 21.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address recently delivered by his colleague [Mr. PEERY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following address made by Hon. GEORGE C. PEERY as temporary chairman at the Democratic convention of the ninth district of Virginia, held in Bristol, Va., on February 21, 1928:

Mr. PEERY. May I first express my gratitude to the district committee for conferring upon me the honor of presiding as temporary chairman over this great convention? I see gathered here many loyal and familiar faces—men and women who represent the finest types of the splendid citizenship that make up the people of the ninth district of Virginia. This honor did not come to me because there are not many others who could discharge it better than I, but I fancy that your committee reasoned that it would, in the limited time of this busy day, afford me the opportunity and privilege of expressing again my gratitude to the Democracy of this district for the signal honors that I have received at your hands in the past.

Six years ago this spring in this city, without solicitation on my part, you placed the banner of Democracy in my hands and bade me carry on to victory—or rather let me more accurately say: You placed the standard in my hands and said: "We will with you carry it to victory." And that vow you kept with fidelity and in splendid fashion.

With fine resolution and spirit and courage the men and women of the Democratic Party in every county in the district rallied to our support and brought victory to our cause. There was joy on that occasion over the fact that a majority of the voters of this great district had registered their approval of the cause of Democracy. The district which had been wandering in the wilderness of Republicanism for 20 years had again returned to the Democratic fold. That victory, so gloriously achieved by you, brought to me the signal honor of becoming your Representative in the lower House of Congress.

Two years later you renewed my commission with an increased majority.

And then, after another two years of service, you again nominated me in this city by acclamation. Thereupon the gloomy prophets of Republicanism said that never in all the history of this great district had a Democrat been elected to Congress for three terms in succession, and that we were, therefore, foredoomed to defeat. But with the same splendid courage and work you smashed that precedent and again brought victory—more decisive than either of the two former ones—to the cause of Democracy. It was your fight, as well as mine, and it was likewise your victory as well as mine. For the honor which you gave me I am profoundly grateful and for the confidence which you continued to repose in me for three successive elections with increased majorities I am doubly thankful.

March next year will mark the close of six years of service as your Representative in Congress. How well I may have served I leave to the record and to you to judge. I have taken a pride in the service, because no other Member of the Congress represents a better district or a finer people.

You have been apprised of my purpose to be relieved from the responsibility of further service at the end of my present term. I do not ask, neither do I expect, to retire from the battle line of Democracy. I only ask that you name another as your standard bearer and allow me to step back into the ranks with you—and continue there to do my part. And from this good day on the one consuming desire of my heart will be to keep the fighting ninth steadfastly in the Democratic column. And to this end will I devote my energy and effort.

And so we meet to-day to declare anew our political faith; and to nominate a candidate to lead us to victory in the approaching campaign.

The need for the application of the principles of Democracy to the affairs of our National Government was never greater than it is to-day. The conflict between the Hamiltonian theory and the Jeffersonian principle of government is still on. The fight for popular government was won by Jefferson in his time, but the fight did not end there. A little later on, and even in Jefferson's own lifetime, Andrew Jackson, termed "the crusader and sword" of Democracy, was called to renew the fight to restore popular government to the people. The issue then was: Should a banking monopoly be allowed to perpetuate itself for the benefit of the favored few at the expense of the many? On this issue "Old Hickory" sounded the call to arms, rallied the legions to his cause, and won a glorious victory. But the minions of special privilege, though once or often defeated, "neither slumber nor sleep," and in their demands for governmental favor are as insistent to-day as they were in Jackson's time. And the call to do battle for the cause of the people is as urgent to-day as it was then.

Political parties are necessary agencies in popular government. But they are to be judged, not by their promises but by the record of achievement. May we take stock of our present national situation by a brief comparison of the more recent record of the two major political parties?

In 1912 the people of this country placed the Democratic Party in control of the Government and under the leadership and splendid statesmanship of that great American, Woodrow Wilson, it entered upon a record of constructive achievement extending over a period of eight years that has never been excelled in any similar period in all of our history.

The business men of our country had suffered from time to time from financial panic and stringency due to the inelastic and antiquated monetary system that had prevailed throughout the years of Republican rule. Complaint from time to time had been made and relief had been demanded, but the Republican Party failed to bring the much-needed relief. The need for such relief was accentuated by the panic of 1907 under the Taft administration, which was aptly characterized as a bankers' panic.

We recall the unpleasant memory of that unfortunate time when many of the banks told us that however much money we might have to our credit we could only draw $25 thereof per day. This problem was met and solved under the leadership of a great Virginian, now a United States Senator and one time Secretary of the Treasury, and the Federal reserve system became the law. It has been pronounced by many as one of the greatest pieces of legislation ever enacted into law. It stood the stress of war and there has been no bankers' panic since that time. This law was given to the American business men and to the public generally by the Democratic Party, and it came in the face of bitter opposition at the hands of the moneyed interests of the country.

The farmer had justly complained that the Government had not placed him upon a plane of equality with the average business man, in that he could not borrow money upon the security of his land alone, the best and most stable security of all. He too, had complained at this discrimination, but the Republican Party had brought no relief. The Democratic Party met this problem, too, and solved it, and the Federal farm loan act was enacted into law. Under it the farmers of our country may borrow from the Government money at a fair interest rate and upon long time on the security of their lands alone. This law, given to the farmers by the Democratic Party, helped to relieve them from the oppressions of the usurer, tending to place them more nearly on an equality with the average business man in the matter of making loans necessary for the conduct of their business.

The laboring man had not received the recognition that he deserved. The Democratic Party offered to him the recognition that was his due. The position of Secretary of Labor was created and a representative of the laboring men of the country was appointed to a seat in the President's Cabinet.

Many other constructive measures were given to the American people during this period by the Democratic Party which proved to be for the good of the country and for the betterment of our people. And throughout this period of splendid achievement prosperity smiled upon us and included within its beneficent folds all classes of our people. It came to the business man, to the farmer, to the laborer, and to all classes of our people.

And during this period a great war came in which America was compelled to take a part in order to help save the civilization of the world. The power and force of American arms were quickly felt. They proved to be the most potent factor in turning the tide in favor of the Allies and in bringing glorious victory to the allied cause.

Marked by brilliant and mighty achievement throughout it all there was no graft or corruption or scandal on the part of any responsible public official. The whole record withstood the white light of investigation at the hands of some 52 investigating committees appointed at the instance of a later Republican administration, and stood forth as a record of unimpeachable honesty and integrity.

And it remained for a great Republican who served overseas, who was called as a witness, by his manly utterances to shame the so-called investigators into silence. That man has since become the Vice President of the United States.

During the war period of great stress, emergency, and sorrow the great Wilson led our people in a spirit of unselfishness, self-sacrifice, and splendid idealism. We fought without thought or hope of added territory or material reward. At its close the people, forgetful of the great achievements that had been wrought and of the fine idealism that prevailed, in a spirit of captious criticism that so often follows any great emergency, decreed that there should be a change in the administration of the affairs of government, and the Republican Party resumed control in 1920.

And how great the change that then occurred! A spirit of materialism and selfishness asserted itself. The privileged few sought special favor. Efficiency gave way to inefficiency.

Honesty was supplanted by corruption and graft in official life and the period that followed is the most sordid page in the official history of this great country of ours. It was not merely inefficiency, graft, and corruption on the part of subordinate employees or officials of the Government, but it was graft, corruption, and inefficiency on the part of some members of the official family of the President of the Nation.

A Republican Secretary of the Interior charged with the administration and preservation of the oil reserves of our Government, kept by former Presidents as inviolate for the safety and future defense of our country, were bartered away for a money bribe. When suspicion arose there was no prompt and vigorous action on the part of the administration to ascertain the truth, and it remained for a great Democratic Senator from the West, in the face of bitter administration opposition, to develop the truth and uncover the infamy. His work and service have been gloriously vindicated by a unanimous decision of the United States Supreme Court declaring that the leasing of these oil lands was founded in fraud and corruption, and by a decree unanimously entered the fraudulent transactions were set aside and the property of the Government was restored.

A Republican Attorney General, against whose appointment the patriotic press of the country directed a well-founded criticism but for whom a Republican President vouched his personal assurance of responsibility and efficiency, brought the administration of his department into utter shame and disrepute. Under his connivance the administration of justice and law was polluted by the slimy hand of the grafter and persons of the underworld. An investigation was forced at the hands of another great Democratic Senator who sought to uncover the truth, and in retaliation this Attorney General perverted the agencies of his department to assassinate and blackmail the character of the very Senator who forced the investigation; but he, too, was vindicated in a court of law and the unfaithful Cabinet official was driven from office in shame and disgrace.

A Republican Secretary of the Navy who allowed the oil reserves to be bartered away, even though he was not a party to the crime himself, was found guilty of such inefficiency in office as to demand his removal at the hands of an outraged public opinion and he, too, was dismissed from office.

A Republican Director of the Veterans' Bureau, charged with the sacred trust of managing the funds which a grateful Nation had set aside for the care and comfort of wounded and disabled ex-service men and their dependents, was found guilty in a court of law of embezzling and misappropriating these funds.

Amid this saturnalia of graft and corruption we wonder if any mortgages were negotiated on the Capitol or whether there are any unrecorded deeds for the White House.

In the early part of the Harding administration the country was shocked by the disclosure that about $195,000 was spent in a Republican primary on behalf of one Truman H. Newberry in the State of Michigan.

More recent disclosures, under the Coolidge administration, in connection with the Republican primaries held in the States of Pennsylvania and Illinois make Newberry a mere piker and the amount expended in the Newberry campaign fades into insignificance when compared with the millions that were expended in the later Republican primaries in Pennsylvania and Illinois.

In the Pennsylvania primary it was shown that the brother of the Secretary of the Treasury was one of the moving spirits and one of the largest contributors. They said that the sky was the limit in Republican primaries in Pennsylvania and the Secretary of the Treasury himself said to the country with much reassurance that contributing to such a cause was "just like giving money to a church." In the Senate investigation of these primaries the fact was developed that one of the largest contributors in the Pennsylvania primary was the head of the Manufacturers' Association. His contribution was $300,000.

In the Illinois primary the fact was developed in the investigation that the head of the greatest power trust in the United States gave at least $125,000 to the slush fund, and his contribution was made to the campaign of a man running for the United States Senate who was then chairman of the public utilities commission of the State of Illinois, charged with the duty of fixing utility rates.

These things, ladies and gentlemen, are facts of ominous import. Contributions of this character are not made in a spirit of philanthropy or from a sense of public duty. They are made to gain an underhold on the man charged with the enactment of laws vitally affecting the interests of those from whom these huge contributions come.

And so shocking were the disclosures to the public conscience and sense of propriety and decency that the Senate of the United States refused to allow VARE and Smith to be sworn in and take their seats of office.

And in our own good State of Virginia the fact was developed that under Republican rule the appointments of postmasters and rural free-delivery carriers were not made on the basis of merit but rather upon the amount of money that the applicant would contribute to the campaign chest. Of course they had to be "very careful about it," else "they might fall into disrepute," and requests were made that letters touching the matter be burned.

And yet we are told that there are no outstanding issues in the coming campaign. What greater issue, more fundamental and basic in its character, can we have than that there should be honesty and integrity in official life?

During the present administration more and greater consolidations of wealth have taken place than in any other like period in the history of our country. Big business is in the saddle demanding and receiving special privilege and protection. And in their zeal many of them have no regard for public opinion and openly flaunt the agencies of government that have been set up for the protection of the public.

Only a few days ago the Walsh Senate committee developed the fact that bonds amounting to some $230,000 were delivered by Harry F. Sinclair and associates to Albert B. Fall in connection with the leasing of Teapot Dome. It was further developed that this amount was a portion of a larger amount of $3,000,000 realized by Sinclair and associates from the fraudulent oil deal engineered through a corporation organized in Canada for their purposes. The committee sought to ascertain from Mr. Stewart, the president of one of the oil companies involved, as to what became of the remainder of the $3,000,000, but he refused to answer and to tell the whole truth. And then the country witnessed the humiliating spectacle of representatives of big business throughout the country flooding this man with telegrams commending him in his refusal to state the facts and tell the truth. The committee has since developed the further startling fact that a substantial portion of the $3,000,000 found its way into the treasury of the Republican National Committee.

The Democratic Party makes no war on big business honestly conducted, but the Democratic Party demands that big business and all other business be conducted with business integrity, so that the truth may at all times be known to the public.

We condemn the activities of high officials connected with the present administration for their efforts in seeking to pack the Interstate Commerce Commission and bring about a monopoly of the Lake Cargo coal trade on behalf of the coal operators of Pennsylvania and in utter disregard of the rights of the coal producers of Virginia and her sister States. For any governmental agency by discriminatory and prohibitive freight rates to give to one industry or section a monopoly in business or trade and destroy the business or trade which another section has won in a fair field and open competition is subversive of the very fundamental principles of right and justice. If the governmental commission, instead of regulating transportation, is to be allowed to take unto itself the tremendous power of regulating industry, it will then become a mere political agency to be controlled by the majority in power. The suspension of the rates in the Lake Cargo case is a direct blow at the coal producers and the miners and the people of Virginia and her sister States.

We condemn this administration for its action in devitalizing the Federal Trade Commission and converting it from an agency for the public good into a subservient instrumentality of the protected interests.

The Republican Party in its last two national platforms has recognized that agriculture has not received equitable treatment in her economic and governmental structure, and it declared for and promised relief. But eight years have passed under Republican rule. Republican promises have not been redeemed. Republican statesmanship has not given to agriculture the relief it promised. And the farmer is still in the ditch.

In our foreign relations we witnessed the spectacle of our Government sending representatives to a peace conference at Habana to talk and promote peace, while just across the sea in Nacaragua we see a large force of United States marines making war on Nicaragua without any authority or consent from Congress and for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of bondholders in Wall Street, who loaned their money with eyes open.

But they tell us that whatever fault we may find or whatever criticisms we may have to offer, this administration has brought to the country a wonderful prosperity, and that this should cover a multitude of sins. I have heard it from Republican spokesmen on the floor of Congress at every session. They have cried "Prosperity! Prosperity!" But of late years the cry has grown fainter and weaker.

What are the facts to-day? One million men out of employment and 3,000,000 working only part time in this country. So alarming has become the situation that the Governor of New York and the Governor of Illinois have directed that the situation be looked into in order that some relief may be provided. The same situation prevails throughout the country.

Thousands of farmers throughout the country have seen their homes and farms sold under mortgage or in foreclosure proceedings. Thousands of others have abandoned their farms because they could not make a comfortable living upon them for their families.

In the last six years there were 2,944 bank failures as against 746 during the eight years of a Democratic administration.

There have been 17,333 commercial failures in the first nine months of 1927, representing an increase of $100,000,000 in liabilities over the same period of the year in 1926.

What is the answer of the coal producers and miners in the ninth district of Virginia to this Republican cry of prosperity? What is the answer of the merchant and the average business man? Are the laboring men in this district making greater wages and enjoying more comforts of life than they enjoyed under the Wilson administration?

We need not answer the questions. The facts speak for themselves. If there be prosperity in the land to-day it is a prosperity limited to the protected interests and to a favored few. It is not a prosperity that extends to the general run of our people.

What is our situation with regard to economy and tax reduction? Everybody apparently favors economy. Both parties declare for tax reduction. The rub comes when you go to readjust and reduce the schedules and determine who, or what class, is to get the greater benefits from the tax reduction.

In this connection let us not forget that the Democratic Party was the author of the graduated income tax law. Under it the man of large income is required to pay a higher rate of income tax than the man of small income. Does any one now doubt the justice and wisdom of that law?

Before the present Congress convened the Secretary of the Treasury told the country that the Treasury would show a large surplus at the end of the present fiscal year and that we could have further tax reduction. The Democratic Party heartily united in the movement for tax reduction. The Ways and Means Committee met in advance of the opening of Congress and held hearings—and a bill was brought in and introduced near the opening of the session. The Democrats in Congress generally supported the bill, but they went further and with the aid of certain progressive Republicans they added three important amendments:

One providing a lower and graduated scale of income tax on small corporations with incomes up to $18,000.

Another abolishing affiliated returns, making each corporation stand upon its own bottom and without allowing one to credit back against its income any loss which another affiliated corporation may have suffered.

And another abolishing the war tax on automobiles.

In the outset the Republican program was to give the American people tax reduction promptly; but now a change has come upon them, and for some strange reason the tax reduction bill is being held up in the Senate by administration leaders; and it now seems doubtful if the administration experts will let this bill become a law.

Incidentally, it is estimated that the Secretary of the Treasury and the corporations controlled by him will have to pay about $1,000,000 per year more in taxes if the Democratic amendment abolishing affiliated returns becomes a law.

Amid all the issues so vitally affecting the American people, the time is ripe for the restoration of the Democratic Party to power and the practical application of the fundamental principle for which it has always stood—equal rights to all and special privileges to none. We need honesty, efficiency, and economy in public life. We need men and women to legislate and administer the laws who are in sympathy with the needs of the unorganized masses rather than those whose legislative and administrative vision are limited to the horizon of special interest and monopolistic power.

The duty before you to-day is to nominate a candidate of this type—one with such vision, inspired by these principles and with the purpose to achieve these ends. And this you will do. When this is done, the fight is just begun!

With the nomination of your candidate there rests upon each of you and upon every loyal Democrat in the district the solemn obligation to use every honorable means from now to election day to bring about his election. I ask of you, and of every Democrat in the district, that you give him the same loyal support and do the same splendid work in his behalf that you have done for me in all of my campaigns.

The story is told that after Andrew Jackson was called to his reward two of his faithful servants were discussing the question as to where he had gone. One expressed the belief that he had gone to heaven; the other said that he didn't know, but that if General Jackson made up his mind to go to heaven, all hell couldn't stop him.

If the Democratic men and women of this district here and now resolve that they will elect the candidate of their choice here to-day, and they follow up that resolution with steady, united, and effective work from now to election day, all the hosts and minions of Republicanism can not stop them.

And victory will be ours again in November.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees. When the Committee on Agriculture was reached—

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 8968, a bill to allow credit in the accounts of William A. Schoenfeld.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that this bill is on the Private Calendar, and therefore not in order on Calendar Wednesday.

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 1181, authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. TILSON. Let its consideration proceed under the rules. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make that request.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this bill ought to be explained more than can be done under the five-minute rule if the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It need not take any more time than is necessary for the explanation of the bill, but it seems to me we should go into the Committee of the Whole, so that a full explanation of the bill may be made to the House.

Mr. ASWELL. Can not that be done under this request?

Mr. TILSON. Only by unanimous consent. It seems best that it should be considered under the rules. Four million dollars is the sum involved, and it seems to me the bill should not be disposed of in any other way.

Mr. ASWELL. Very well.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1181, with Mr. HOCH in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of June 7, 1924 (Public, 270), available upon the passage and approval of this bill, $1,000,000; available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $3,000,000; available July 1, 1930, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1931, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1932, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1933, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1934, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1935, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1936, $6,000,000; in all for this period, $40,000,000, to be available until expended: Provided, That, except for the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control and reduction of floods therein, no lands shall be purchased under the appropriations herein authorized in excess of 1,000,000 acres in any one State.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, beginning in line 4, after the parenthesis, strike out the remainder of line 4 and all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and insert "available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $2,000,000; in all for this period, $4,000,000."

HON. GEORGE S. GRAHAM

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, ever since the beginning of the present session, Members of the House have known that one of our most honored and distinguished Members has been very ill; in fact, there has been considerable uneasiness in regard to his condition. As I look through the door of the lobby now I see the distinguished gentleman to whom I refer. He has now come into the Hall and I wish to express to him, on behalf of the entire House, I believe, the sentiment that we are delighted to see return to the floor of the House in his usual good health our good friend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. GRAHAM, of Pennsylvania. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] whatever time the gentleman may desire—one hour.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for any statement he cares to make.

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to express my appreciation of this welcome back to the House. I have recovered and I believe will be in good health. I am glad to resume the discharge of my duties here. I traveled down through the valley of the shadow, but the Lord has brought me back. My work was not completed, for every man is immortal until his work is done. Mine evidently was not done.

It is a source of great pleasure and gratification to me to see you all again. [Applause.]

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the bill under consideration to-day is what is known as the McNary-Woodruff bill. It is the result of the experience of our great Forest Service and has been introduced in the Senate and in the House for the purpose of authorizing appropriations to carry out the provisions of the Weeks law, which was enacted in 1911, and the McNary-Clarke law, enacted in 1924.

The experience the Forest Service has had in seeking to secure land, under the provisions of the bills I have mentioned, has been such that the officials have come to the conclusion that the only way in which this work can be done efficiently and economically is to have a purchasing program over a period of years which would enable them to get together an organization which could do this work in the efficient way it should be done.

The bill under consideration is not the House bill. Some time ago the Senate passed the bill introduced by Senator MCNARY, of Oregon, and in order to save time, in order to make it possible for the two Houses to get together in conference, I have asked the House Committee on Agriculture to take up and to consider the Senate bill instead of the House bill.

The Senate bill provided for a 10-year program authorizing the expenditure of $40,000,000 over this period of time. It seemed to the men who had this work in charge that a program of that length was necessary to give them the opportunities to do the work in the efficient way that it should be done. The Bureau of the Budget has recommended and approved only a two-year program involving $2,000,000 per year for the two years.

I was disappointed, of course, in the action of the Committee on Agriculture of the House. The members, perhaps, felt that a two-year program was as far as they should go in view of the recommendation and approval of the Bureau of the Budget, but it seems to me that whatever differences there are between the two Houses can be ironed out by the conferees on the part of the House and the Senate.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What reason did the Bureau of the Budget give for turning down your suggested program?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not know what reason the Bureau of the Budget gave the Committee on Agriculture. I do know the reason the Director of the Bureau of the Budget gave me. He said that the administration——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What was the reason?

Mr. WOODRUFF. If the gentleman will permit, I will answer his question. The Director of the Budget informed me that the administration did not care to enter into any program looking further than two years in advance on a matter of this kind.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Is that a very good reason?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think not.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I still ask for the reason.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will say I think that is not a reason at all.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That is what I wanted the gentleman to say.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I notice this authorizes an appropriation to be available July 1, 1928.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. My impression is that the appropriation bill passed some days ago for the Department of Agriculture carried some money for that year for the purchase of forest lands. Was it $1,000,000? It was quite a large amount I know.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not remember that the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill carried an appropriation in that amount for this year. I am informed, however, that the Director of the Bureau of the Budget either has sent up or will send up an authorization for $1,000,000 for that purpose this year.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. My impression is the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill carried an appropriation for the next fiscal year—that is, beginning the 1st of July of this year.

I am heartily in favor of the bill. I was a member of the Committee on Agriculture when the Weeks bill was brought out. I have always thought it a piece of good legislation, and I wish to see appropriations made to continue it in operation.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will.

Mr. SNELL. I notice on page 2 of the report it names different States where they can buy land. Is it limited to those States now?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Not at all. Under the provisions of the bill they can buy land in any State in the United States.

Mr. SNELL. This simply makes more money available? It does not change the policy?

Mr. WOODRUFF. It modifies the existing law in the proviso starting in line 12, page 2, of the bill where it limits the purchase of land to 1,000,000 acres of land in any State, which we think is a wise provision.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. This provides money for use otherwise than carrying out the Weeks Act, which expressly limits the purchase of land only for the protection of the sources of navigable streams. At the time the bill was before the House the question of its constitutionality was discussed. The question was raised as to the right of the Federal Government to acquire land indiscriminately anywhere for any purpose—that is, for all purposes. So, the Congress having authority over navigable streams, the purchase of land was limited to the protection of the sources of those streams. Does the bill of the gentleman from Michigan and others of which you are speaking go to the extent of authorizing the purchase of land anywhere?

Mr. WOODRUFF. This bill has nothing to do with the functioning of the law. The purpose of this bill is to authorize the appropriations to be expended under the provisions of the Weeks law and the McNary-Clarke law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Am I right in saying that the Weeks law provided only for the acquisition of land at the source of navigable streams?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think so; but that law has been liberalized by the Clarke-McNary Act of 1924.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The report says that the 19 purchase areas hitherto established under the Weeks law are situated in different States, naming the States. Has the number of States been extended in the Clarke-McNary law?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes. As I understand, land can now be purchased in any State where the commission sees fit to purchase land, but this bill has nothing to do with that. The gentleman is reading from the report and not from the bill.

Mr. SNELL. With reference to the bill, what I want to know is if this authorization is carried out can they buy land in any State they please?

Mr. WOODRUFF. They can.

Mr. SNELL. Where has it been liberalized? It says in the original law they can only buy it in certain States.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] to explain the provisions of that law.

Mr. SNELL. Then I will ask the gentleman from New York can the Federal Government buy land in any State? On page 2 of the report it says:

> The 19 purchase areas hitherto established under the Weeks law are situated in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Maine, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia.

Can they buy land in any other State than those mentioned?

Mr. CLARKE. They can.

Mr. SNELL. When was it liberalized?

Mr. CLARKE. Under the Clarke-McNary Act we widened the scope in the purchase of land.

Mr. SNELL. So now it applies to practically every State in the Union?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes; but it is limited to 1,000,000 acres in any one State in this bill. This bill continues the fiscal policy for 2 years where we hoped to have it for 10 years.

Mr. SNELL. This bill makes available a certain amount of money with a limitation of 1,000,000 acres in any one State?

Mr. CLARKE. Absolutely.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I think every member of the committee now understands the purpose of this act. I think every man in the House realizes the importance of reforestation.

Nearly every one of us has seen the time when forests were everywhere in the country. We realize that nearly all of those forests have gone. I remember the day in Michigan when, if it were suggested that the time would ever come when the great forests of Michigan would be cut down and used up, one would have been laughed to scorn. To-day we have few forests in Michigan

The products of the forests to-day are being used five times as fast as they are being grown in this country, and there can be only one answer to that. It seems to me that the country has been negligent and that the Congress has been negligent in the past in not providing money for the purpose of reforesting. Certainly the trees that are planted to-day will not reach maturity before most of our great forests have gone. This work should have been started years ago, and now that the Congress has an opportunity to help the thing along, we ought not to hesitate. This same bill passed this House a year ago with, I think, something like 13 dissenting votes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is to be commended for getting his bill up at this time, but the Committee on Agriculture, out of its regular order, has been given this Calendar Wednesday day in order to bring up bills to benefit agriculture. The bill of the distinguished gentleman now under consideration is a reforesting bill. I am wondering if the great Committee on Agriculture, with the Congress having been in session since the first part of last December, now having the floor to bring up anything it wants to bring up in behalf of the farmer, has not anything to bring up in behalf of the farmers of this country. I hope that in his own time the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] will answer my inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The gentleman from Michigan has made a study of reforestation. I am wondering what is being done by the department in the matter of actually planting trees.

Mr. WOODRUFF. They have been planting trees to the extent of the appropriations that they have been able to get from Congress each year for a number of years.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In other words, they actually are putting trees in the ground?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes. We have at this time in the lower peninsula of Michigan a national forest where trees are being planted and grown more cheaply than anywhere else in the world. At the Beal Nursery in East Tawas, Mich., they are gathering the seeds and planting them and growing little trees and planting them in the forests for something like $3.50 an acre, and they are planting 800 trees to the acre.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Can the gentleman tell us about what price the Government is paying for this land for purposes of reforestation?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not know. I know that they have bought thousands of acres of land for as low as a dollar an acre, and they are being planted as rapidly as funds are available.

Mr. BRIGHAM. What is the gentleman's opinion as to the financial outcome of this policy? Does he think the Government will realize a good financial return on its investment?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think there is no question about that. That is a question which has been very fully covered by the representatives of the forestry department before the several committees. They can point out clearly where this, as a financial investment, is one of the finest things the United States could enter into. Of course, the purpose of the Federal Government is not to plant all the trees that must be grown if we are to have forests in the future. The purpose of establishing Federal forests in Michigan and other States is to point out to the States and to private individuals how they, with their lands, can plant trees and eventually reap a very fine return on the investment.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman relate some of the work being done in a cooperative way by our own extension service in Michigan?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman to give that information to the House.

Mr. KETCHAM. I can only say this, that in our own State, and I am sure in other States of the Union, the value of this whole program of reforestation is highly appreciated. Not only is it highly appreciated, but active cooperation is being carried on by various extension agencies. I happen to know that on the west side of Michigan a number of counties have put on campaigns in which they have had the cooperation of the chambers of commerce, the local service, and luncheon clubs, and various other public agencies in planting very considerable and definite areas with these trees, which will certainly reforest that land which has a greater value for that purpose than for any other. I am sure that this program that is being carried out in our State is likewise being carried out in other States, and it seems to me it is worthy of emphasis in this connection.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. I can supplement the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] with the statement that in New York State to-day our Junior Project Workers, among the youngsters, are planting at least 2,000,000 trees in individual projects. They are projects where fathers have given to the children an acre or two acres in their own right to plant and take care of. Our school districts carried on a campaign last year in connection with the Junior Project Workers, cooperating with the State of New York. The school districts had lands given to them in which to set out trees.

Now, then, answering the gentleman from Vermont, I will say this, that so far as the returns go, individual experience has demonstrated that this in the long run would have a good effect, that the forest will return $5 an acre per year to any community or any individual that is willing to devote some little attention to the care and protection of the trees. But a bigger thing than that is the fact that all over the country to-day we find people concentrating their efforts on construction instead of destruction. Among the most profitable things in the world are the by-products of reforestation in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. I agree with the gentleman; and I may add, for the information of the Members present, that there are a number of cities in Europe that have their own private or municipal forests. They harvest the forest every year, taking such trees as are matured and ready for cutting, and the revenues proceeding from it pay the complete and entire running expenses of those municipalities.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that we have a law in Vermont authorizing municipal forests, and several of our communities have availed themselves of that law. Some of them have planted out large forests to protect the sources of their municipal water supplies. Particularly is this true of the city of Rutland in my district. This thriving city now owns about 3,800 acres of land on the watershed of its water supply. On this land over 500,000 trees have been planted during the past 10 years. The trees first planted have now made a very impressive growth, and not only afford a splendid protection to the water supply of this city, insuring its purity and its continuity, but the plantation gives promise of yielding a good financial profit in years to come.

Mr. MICHENER. Are these municipal forests exempt from local taxation?

Mr. BRIGHAM. As I remember the Vermont law, individual forests are taxed in this way: Lands may be classified as forest lands and are subject to the local rate of taxation annually upon the valuation of the land alone, which valuation may not be increased for a long period of years. When the trees are cut for commercial purposes a tax must be paid by the owner based on the market value of the timber. In regard to municipal forests, if such forests are located within the territorial limits of the municipality, they are not taxed. However, if they are located within the territorial limits of another municipality, they are subject to the same tax that would be levied if they were owned by individuals. Even our State-owned forests are subjected to the same rate of local taxation as individually owned forests. This is a protection of our local municipalities against depletion of their taxable property.

Mr. MICHENER. Has the gentleman information along that line as to whether or not, where individuals plant forests, the land or the trees are taxed, or whether the land continues to be taxed at the same rate as it was taxed before the increased value was added by the reforestation?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I can not answer the gentleman's question, but I will say this, that I think the time is coming in every State of the Union where laws will have to be passed by the legislatures so that the land in reforestation will be free of taxation.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. Until that time we shall have much difficulty in reforesting our lands.

Mr. CLARKE. I think I can shed some light on that point. In New York State we had a law which permitted the exemption from taxation of these lands that were set out in trees. Two years ago we found that in some of our remote country school districts, if the lands were set out in trees and this land taken away for taxation purposes for the upkeep of those schools it was necessary for them to have something to tax, so that it was provided under the Fisher law that during the time the trees were growing on the land the assessed valuation would not be increased over comparable land in those sections. But when you cut the trees a revenue tax must be paid into the school district, town, and county on a part of the proceeds. You go back into the country district where they need a little tax to keep up their country schools, and if you deny them this tax you are going to cripple the schools.

Mr. MICHENER. You can not induce capital to invest until you guarantee that you will not take it all out in taxes. In that respect you follow the German system?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. In the last agricultural appropriation bill that passed the House a few days ago there is an item to carry on a broad, comprehensive study of taxation of timber lands. It is fully understood that a permanent timber policy, a conservation policy for the country requires that this tax problem be constructively worked out. We carry and have been carrying heretofore an item in the agricultural appropriation bill to enable the Forest Service, through its experts, to consider the entire problem throughout the Nation, in order to bring about some satisfactory solution of the problem. In order to have a general policy worked out it is required that the Federal Government spend some time and money in studying it from a national viewpoint to give the States the benefit of the study they make in order that the States may profit by acting along the same lines.

Mr. ADKINS. Speaking of exemption from taxes, the objection we ran up against in our State was the large number of big estates whose owners insisted that that land should be allowed to get by without taxation. Thus far we have never been able to get a law on that.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to present. I think the bill is fully understood, and I hope it will be approved without further discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat. 961), as amended by the acts of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 828), June 30, 1914 (38 Stat. 441), and the act of June 7, 1924 (Public, 270), available upon the passage and approval of this bill, $1,000,000; available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $3,000,000; available July 1, 1930, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1931, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1932, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1933, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1934, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1935, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1936, $6,000,000; in all for this period, $40,000,000, to be available until expended: Provided, That except for the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control and reduction of floods therein, no lands shall be purchased under the appropriations herein authorized in excess of 1,000,000 acres in any one State.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, beginning in line 4, after the parenthesis, strike out the remainder of line 4, all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and insert "available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $2,000,000; in all for this period, $4,000,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I merely rise to emphasize the importance of the passage of this bill at this time. In the State of Louisiana we have some 17,000,000 acres of cut-over lands and the owners of large tracts of land are clamoring constantly for more and more authority for reforesting them and utilizing them for other purposes. The corporations in my State which own millions of acres of these cut-over lands are asking now under the Clarke-McNary bill for more authority to cooperate with the Federal Government in the use of these cut-over lands. In my opinion there is no measure before the Congress that will do more permanent good in the future than the expansion of this law and its associate law.

I merely want to emphasize the wisdom, the economy, and the patriotic devotion to our country's interest in the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to use two or three minutes in connection with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would like to say that this bill, H. R. 10374, known as the Woodruff bill, to my mind is a very important piece of legisiation. Speaking for my State, I will say that we of South Carolina are very much interested in the line of work proposed under this bill.

We have thousands of waste and denuded lands as well as rich lands on the coast that should be used for the purposes intended in this legislation. I have received quite a number of letters from my constituents regarding this type of legislation, and in every instance they are for this line of work. The State for the last few years has become intensely interested, and I am sure will cooperate to the fullest extent with the Federal Government in carrying on this work.

I intended some time ago to introduce a bill along this line, having in mind my State more especially, and went so far as to hold one or two conferences with representatives of the Interior Department. The reason that I did not introduce my bill was because I found that by cooperating in the passage of this bill, or the McSweeney bill, I could accomplish the same thing that I had in mind.

My friends, I can remember in my boyhood days how farmers used to clear their lands and roll together in large piles the finest kind of long-leaf timber and burn same so as to clear the land for the purpose of cultivating.

We of the South have had in the past wonderful resources in all kinds of timber, but to-day and for the past few years, especially the last seven years, because of the serious condition of agriculture timber is being cut at a rate that within a few years we will have destroyed these resources unless this line of work is carried on on a large scale.

We passed in the Sixty-eighth Congress a bill introduced by my colleague, Mr. CLARKE, of New York, a member of the Agricultural Committee, which had to do with a plan for the purpose of protecting forest areas. The Federal Government could enter into cooperative arrangements with the State for protecting forest lands. It was under this bill, section 9, that I succeeded in having the President of the United States, Mr. Coolidge, pass the Camp Jackson lands under this law, which became the Camp Jackson National Forest. At the time of the passage of the Clarke bill, the Federal Government was cooperating with 26 States, and these States were receiving an appropriation of $400,000 annually. Along with this amount, the States were contributing about $1,900,000 and private individuals $1,000,000.

I received a letter from Hon. James H. Hammond, State senator of Richland County, my district, on the 31st of August, 1927, supporting this type of legislation. He stated that it appears to be one of our greatest needs at that time, and trusted that I would look into it and do what I could to get the legislation passed. He also stated that he expected to familiarize himself with this legislation and have the bill indorsed by a resolution in the general assembly next spring.

I received a letter from Dr. E. W. Sykes, president of Clemson College, South Carolina, requesting me to give my support to this legislation, as it would assist them in that line of work in South Carolina.

I clipped from the Columbia State paper some time ago a very interesting article written by James Henry Rice, jr., on this subject. I am going to insert same in the RECORD because I think it timely and contains some good information:

AGAIN THE SLASH PINE

To the EDITOR OF THE STATE:

Afforestation of the State's idle acres seems to have struck deeper into the minds of citizens than any of us imagined. Since The State published my article on the slash pine inquiries have come in at once. It is noteworthy that many of these have come from the upcountry. All desire information as to whether slash pine is suitable for reforesting upper counties. Some of the inquiries I have already answered, but in the general interest one answer through The State may suffice for all.

There is no reason why the slash pine would not grow and flourish in the upcountry on suitable soils—and almost all soils are suitable, except those with shallow hardpan. Mr. Mattoon has told us that on such soils slash pines are stunted, perhaps because of the enormous length of their tap roots. We have found them here more than 20 feet long. This fact explains to some extent the vigor and rapidity of the tree's growth.

Around Athens, Ga., just over Savannah River from Abbeville County, with soil and climate similar to those in upper South Carolina, slash pines are being grown successfully on a large scale and by many people. Mr. Mattoon was impressed by their success. East of a line from Anderson across the State to York there ought to be little trouble with slash pines. Probably small stands will be found at some points there now. There was formerly a superb lot of long-leaf pines around Kirksey, 10 miles south of Ninety Six, now a part of Greenwood County. Slash pines would grow there beyond a doubt.

It takes only a short while to determine, for after three years the question will have enough light shed on it. Should the pines be found growing vigorously then, it means they will keep on growing, for the slash pine sends down a tap root almost like it was boring into the earth.

Tree planting has burst forth into life in many parts of the State.

While it remains to be determined to what extent afforestation with the slash pine can be carried on in the upcountry, there is no question in the remaining two-thirds of the State. Plant the seed or set out plants, keep off fire, and the rest will take care of itself.

The most significant feature of the forestry movement is what goes on in Georgia, where farmers by the thousands are setting out plants.

Georgia is a practical State, and while Georgians love politics almost as much as we do, they knock off when it comes down to business. Many of them have planted slash pines long enough to realize that there is good safe money in it, for they begin tapping trees for turpentine long before they cut them, and the slash pine is the only pine that tapping does not hurt, provided the cutting is done with reason.

With the bulk of our idle lands grown up in slash pines, South Carolina would be a mine of wealth. The time will never come when there is lack of demand. It is a money crop just as much as cotton and much safer, being less subject to drought and other injuries, besides bringing in money the year round.

It will take a few years before returns come in; but how much are these idle lands bringing in now? How much are they likely to bring in? They draw taxes all right.

All lands being afforested should be exempt from anything but a severance tax, so as to encourage tree planting.

The whole thing is nothing but ordinary common sense, and from all I hear the citizens of the State, left to their own devices, are taking the matter in their own hands.

A story from A. B. Bryan, of Clemson College, as to what is actually being accomplished through the farm extension work will surprise people. I would like to see it myself, for my information comes in snatches. Most interesting and valuable work is being done at Drainland, the beginning of which I saw. Let Mr. Bryan tell the story in his own bright and newsy style.

JAMES HENRY RICE, Jr.,
Brick House Plantation, Chee-Ha River (Wiggins).

ACREAGE OF LAND

Our total acreage of land in the United States is 1,903,000,000 acres, so I am informed. Our total crop acreage in 1920 (I have not the figures for a later date at this time) was 365,000,000, with an estimated potential tillable acreage of 973,000,000. These were the figures stated by Mr. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, when he came before our committee in 1924. Mr. Wallace stated that these large estimated figures included all the land which might be brought under cultivation by irrigation, included the vast areas which could not possibly be brought in for many generations, and included lands which might be brought in by drainage.

RECLAMATION IN THE SOUTH

Quite a lot has been said recently in the South about draining lands, thereby bringing them into cultivation. This would have been wonderful work 25 years ago when our people had to struggle along as best they could to bring in thousands of acres of uncultivated lands, especially in the coastal regions. To-day, it is not more farm lands that we need in the South, but less farm acreage with better fertilization and more intensive cultivation. The balance of the worn-out acreage, along with thousands of acres of denuded lands should be replanted in trees for the future. I have in my district within about 5 miles of my home town, a drainage project known as the Bowman (S. C.) drainage district, where our people have voted bonds and cut canals, some of the finest soil to be found in any agricultural section. To-day, because of the inequality of agriculture as compared with other lines of industry, and because of the very heavy State and county taxes, interest on bonds, as well as the boll weevil to contend with, thousands of our farmers are losing their lands and homes.

I have been trying to get the ears of the Interior Department with the hope that I might get their support to take care of a situation like this, but they seem to be bent on spending millions to clean up and drain other lands which, in my mind, will just add to the already too many acres of tillable lands.

One of the great troubles with our southern farmers is that they want to spread just a little fertilizer all over what land they have and can rent, and spread what labor they have over these large farms, which brings about underproduction per acre, thereby making the cost of production unreasonable.

ORIGINAL FORESTED AREA

The original forested area of the United States is estimated to have been 822,000,000 acres. This area has been reduced to 463,000,000 acres. A considerable part of this remaining acreage has been culled of its best timber.

The original saw-timber stand of the United States has been estimated at not less than four thousand two hundred billion board feet. This has been reduced to about two thousand billion board feet.

About three-fourths of the total present stand of timber, including the best and most accessible, is in private ownership. Less than one-fourth is included in the national forests. The remainder, about 3 per cent, is owned by States and municipalities.

The average consumption of saw timber in the United States is approximately forty billion board feet. If this rate continues, our present stand will be exhausted in about 50 years.

The people of the United States are using their timber four times as fast as growth replaces it. European countries cut no more each year than they grow. In the United States there is an ample area of land good for nothing except to grow trees, to produce all the timber we need for all purposes for all time. The unproductive part of this area should be put to work and kept at work growing trees.

NATIONAL FOREST POLICY

Since last year's report the condition of the country in the matter of its forests has become still clearer. A new study of the whole situation made by the Forest Service revealed more definitely how the public policy should be shaped. Two national problems are involved—land use and timber supply. Down to about 1880 land clearing for agriculture more than kept pace with lumbering, but since that time virgin forests have been cut off under the tremendous demand of a vigorous, growing, and increasingly industrialized Nation much faster than the advance of farming could convert the stump lands into cultivated fields. Except in the South and West, in the last census decade the area of improved farm land was either practically stationary or decreasing. Lumbering adds to the cut-over area at the rate of about 10,000,000 acres a year, but what of this goes into farms is almost offset by abandonment of cultivation elsewhere. Eighty million acres of idle land not in demand for agriculture have become a dead weight on the regions in which they have accumulated.

On the other hand, the eastern and most populous part of the country has already begun to suffer the pinch of timber scarcity and high lumber prices in consequence of forest depletion. The remaining virgin timber in the South and far West still enables us to meet our needs for high-grade lumber, but at a steadily rising cost. Second-growth eastern forests eke out the supply, but we are draining our forests, East and West, of a total of 25,000,000,000 cubic feet of wood annually, while growth replaces only 6,000,000,000. Our future needs must be met from our own forests, and substitutes and economies in utilization will only partially offset the normal increase in demand as population increases. We should, if possible, produce permanently as much wood as we now require.

The present annual growth could be increased to about 14,000,000,000 feet, or a little over half our present requirements, if all our forests were given adequate protection against fire and elementary practices of forestry were introduced. By intensive forest management, comparable to the best European practice, our total area of forest land could be made to grow 27,000,000,000 cubic feet annually, or enough to take care of our present consumption and afford a little surplus.

The agricultural needs of the country will not make necessary the decrease of our present forest-land area of 470,000,000 acres in order to produce food. This land should be brought under management and, where necessary, reclaimed through reforestation as quickly as possible, since at best the country must pass through a considerable period of timber scarcity before new stands of merchantable size can be grown on the cut-over lands.

Recent developments in Canada raise the problem of timber supplies from another angle. In June, 1923, the Canadian Parliament amended the export act to authorize the governor in council to place an embargo upon the export of pulpwood from privately owned lands in the Dominion. This authorization, if carried out, would extend to all privately owned lands the embargo now in effect upon the Crown lands of several of the Canadian Provinces most important to the United States from the standpoint of pulpwood supply.

Imports of pulpwood from Canada for a number of years have normally exceeded 1,000,000 cords out of an average annual consumption in the United States of 5,400,000 cords during the past five years. An embargo upon Canadian pulpwood would be serious, because the paper-mill capacity in the Northeast and the Lake States exceeds the existing supply of domestic timber. The action taken by Canada is simply another indication of the growing stringency of timber supply in North America.

As a result of the threatened embargo, the pulp and paper industry has requested the Forest Service to make a survey of the raw materials available for the paper industry in the United States. An important feature of this survey is to determine our resources for growing pulpwood, with a view to creating a perpetual source of raw material on American soil.

With only about 21 per cent of the country's forest lands in public ownership, a number of the States, as well as the Federal Government, are moving for the extension of publicly owned forests. Already 200 municipalities, including cities, towns, and counties, own approximately 450,000 acres of forest land, held primarily for water supply and to a limited extent for timber growing and recreational purposes. Nineteen States have established State forests, totaling about 5,500,000 acres, of which New York has nearly 2,000,000 and Pennsylvania slightly over 1,000,000 acres. For the purchase of State forests, New York in 1916 authorized a bond issue of $7,500,000, and in Pennsylvania a bond issue of $25,000,000 for the same purpose is proposed.

SOUTH CAROLINA PROJECTS

I am glad to say that the Interior Department has already passed on two projects in South Carolina; one in Georgetown County to contain 75,000 acres, and one in Charleston and Berkley Counties to contain 50,000 acres. They hope to take on two more projects which will contain about the same number of acres, all of which will come under this bill.

A STATION FOR SOUTH CAROLINA

It is my hope to secure a station located in South Carolina very soon. I am going to insert at this point copy of letter to Mr. W. B. Greeley, and his reply thereto, which states that he is very much in sympathy with my plans of locating a station in my State:

JANUARY 17, 1928.

Mr. W. B. GREELEY,
Chief Forest Service, Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GREELEY: I am very much interested in the establishing of a Forest Service station in South Carolina. The people in my State and adjoining States are very much interested in reforestation and if it would be possible to establish a station at Columbia, S. C., it would not only serve the State of South Carolina, but adjoining States as well. I am sure that the colleges, especially the Agricultural College of South Carolina, would be glad to cooperate. For the past seven years, because of the depressed condition in agriculture, farmers have had to cut and sell their timber to carry on. I know of no better time to start this kind of work than now, so that the recut-over land may be replanted and a general forestry work carried on. I hope that you will give this very serious and favorable consideration because of the serious condition of agriculture in the South and because of the splendid opportunity of helping out these conditions by establishing reforestation in South Carolina and adjoining States.

With very best wishes and many, many thanks for all past favors, I am,

Yours very truly, H. P. FULMER, M. C.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, January 26, 1928.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FULMER: In reply to your letter of January 17:

I am pleased to note the growing interest being taken in the reforestation problem in South Carolina and to know of your own interest in research. As Mr. Kneipp told you, we have divided the country into 12 geographic regions, where the forest problems are more or less comparable. This has permitted us to study these problems in the large, and thus to obtain results which can be applied in principle over extended areas, leaving to local agencies—such as the State foresters, forest schools, and privately employed foresters—the application of these results to local situations.

While we have every sympathy with your desire to have a separate station for South Carolina, my judgment is that for the present at least it would be better to continue to concentrate our present resources of men and money at the established stations. This belief is based upon the large regions upon which general forestry information is badly needed and upon the tremendous scope of the problems involved. As the work develops and the more urgent problems have been solved, the further division of the various regions may well be considered, though the smaller the units the greater will be the cost and difficulty of administration.

In the first division of the country into regions, South Carolina was placed in that served by the southern forest experiment station, whose headquarters are in New Orleans. Unfortunately distance and other matters have prevented doing much beyond a small amount of work near Lane. Because of this and because also the Appalachian Forest experiment station has now been able to enlarge its activities, South Carolina has recently been added to the region served by Asheville, as shown on the inclosed map. This should permit more work in South Carolina, since the problems of much of your State are very similar to those of North Carolina, and because South Carolina can be so readily reached from Asheville.

Under the present arrangement, as you perhaps know, the headquarters of the forest experiment stations are merely the offices where the records are maintained and where the personnel have their residence. Field work is done at a series of branch stations, each located at a place from which several distinct forest types or a number of different forest conditions may be reached. The number of such branches, as well as the problems attacked, depend in a measure upon the available resources. That we have not been able so far to do much in South Carolina is indicative of the handicaps under which we are working. A bill by Mr. MCSWEENEY (H. R. 6091) is now before Congress. If enacted this bill would permit an orderly growth and enable the experiment station to undertake much-needed work of the kind you have in mind. Such a measure appeals to me more just now than a separate station in your State, and I hope it also does to you.

Very sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY, Forester.

AN URGENT NATIONAL NEED

There is no more important lesson for the American people to learn than the need of growing and conserving forests and trees. Our future development as a Nation will largely hinge upon the success with which we can spread this gospel.

JOHN J. TIGERT,
United States Commissioner of Education.

TREES AND THE NEXT GENERATION

There can be no more important educational work than turning the attention of the new generations to the importance of trees. On every hand we will see this importance if we will but look. The thing is to get us to look.

Mrs. MARY KING SHERMAN,
President General Federation of Women's Clubs.

TO THE TEACHERS OF FUTURE CITIZENS

Our civilization is so dependent upon forest products that we can not do without them. Teachers must do their part in establishing firmly in the minds of the school children the accepted policies of modern forestry.

Prof. E. LAURENCE PALMER,
Cornell University,
Director Nature Education Section of Nature Magazine.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this legislation. I can not hope to add very much to the information of the House, but practically I have been engaged, as the owner of land, in this kind of thing for the last 25 years.

The statement made a while ago, that the value of the timber increases about $5 a year refers, I take it, to the most favorable condition and the most favorable cultivation. I have a rather large tract off of which I sold the timber in 1902. They completed the cutting in 1904 and then I took care of it; I did not allow fire to get into it and it was rich land, largely swamp land. In 1917 I sold the timber off of it again and received a good deal more than I received for the timber in 1902. It averaged an increase of about $1 per acre a year. This is timberland to which you do not give any extra attention except to protect it from fire. That is about what you can expect from it in the southern country, where there is plenty of rain and if the land is rich.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. You say the increase in the value of the timber was only $1 an acre?

Mr. STEVENSON. That was the increase in value per acre. In other words, what grew from 1905 to 1917 I sold for just about an increase of $1 an acre a year; in other words, I received about $12 an acre for what grew on 800 acres in that length of time, and now the timber is growing again.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGHAM. What kind of timber was that?

Mr. STEVENSON. Almost every kind. What is known as lob-lolly pine, gum, oak, and hickory.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Was it sold for firewood?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is good for firewood, but it goes into lumber of the very finest kind, and is very much sought after. In addition to that, it is good for crossties, and whenever it gets big enough you have to watch the railroad company from getting in there for the purpose of cutting it for crossties.

That is one situation. Now, the other one to which I want to call your attention is this: You have another Government instrumentality that is tending to run counter to this. As I said a while ago, the lands that are subject to overflow and the lands that need drainage are the rich lands in the South that grow timber and grow it rapidly; but we have a drive on in my country, and my friend who just spoke has received, as I have received, a lot of propaganda for reclamation; that is, for the drainage of those very lands. Now, those lands in the South are the source of its supply of timber. The timber grows faster there than anywhere else and the land is worth more for the growing of timber than it is for anything else. Those lands are worth more with timber on them than they would be worth if you drained them and attempted to grow something on them, for after drainage the boll weevil would get into your cotton, because it is on such land that the boll weevil flourishes.

Mr. FULMER. The gentleman contends it could be used to a much better advantage along this line rather than to drain the land and bring it under cultivation?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; very much better. Of course, the land is rich, but with boll-weevil conditions it is much better. When I finished cutting off the timber on this tract I refer to I was confronted with the question of clearing the land and putting it in cotton. If it were not for the boll weevil I could make a bale of cotton to the acre on the greater part of the land, but with the uncertainties that have been brought about in the South by the boll weevil it is bad policy to drain and clear up these lands when you can grow timber on them that will be worth more, and the taxes on them are practically nothing, so far as our country is concerned. I think when it comes to valuing this land they almost forget about it. Of course,

I pay some taxes on the land, whatever they assess, but they have sense enough not to assess it to an extent that will kill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOCH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 1181, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed as a House document the speech made by the President of the United States last February when the Houses were in joint session in celebration of the birthday of George Washington, and that the speech be printed in 10-point type. I understand it is standing in 10-point type at the Printing Office now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to print in 10-point type the address delivered by the President of the United States before a joint session of both Houses at the celebration of the birthday of George Washington. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JUSTICE TO THE EMERGENCY OFFICERS

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 10436, introduced by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker, supplemental legislation is greatly needed to correct the excessive disparities between the pay of those former emergency officers, originally appointed lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains under section 24 of the act of June 4, 1920, and officers of the pre-war Regular Army now in those grades. I feel sure these inequalities and unfair, unjust discriminations against the emergency officers were never intended by Congress, would never have occurred had Congress been properly and fully advised in the matter at the time of the passage of the pay readjustment act in 1922, and will quickly be wiped out when Congress realizes the situation.

This pay act was a measure intended to equalize conditions, to partially recompense the emergency officers in pay for what they had lost or been deprived of by various unjust and discriminatory measures, rulings, constructions, and acts. Briefly stated, the following are some of the ways in which the emergency officers did not receive a square deal:

The Army reorganization act of June 4, 1920, provided that "not less than one-half" of the vacancies caused by the act "shall be filled by the appointment" of emergency officers, "a suitable number in each of the grades," but no provision was made to appoint any emergency officers as generals. So of the generals now in the Army none are emergency officers and notwithstanding the provisions of the law of the 532 colonels in the Army only 4 are emergency officers, and of the 656 lieutenant colonels, 2,174 majors, and 4,054 captains in the Army the letter from F. Trubee Davison, Assistant Secretary of War, to Hon. JOHN H. MORIN, chairman Committee on Military Affairs, dated March 5, 1928, states there are actually only 16 emergency officers in the grade of lieutenant colonel, 263 in the grade of major, and 952 in the grade of captain, who will be benefited by this bill.

Next, the act of June 4, 1920, placed certain limitations and restrictions upon the emergency officers, none of which were imposed on the pre-war regulars, another discrimination and hardship. To be appointed a colonel, an emergency officer must have been past 48 years of age, to be a lieutenant colonel, past 45 years of age, to be a major, past 36 years of age, and all must pass certain examinations, both as to physical and mental qualifications. Whilst for the pre-war regular, on the contrary, there were no restrictions or requirements as to age or mental examinations. So at the time of appointment we find all emergency colonels past 48, all emergency lieutenant colonels past 45, the average age of the emergency majors around 43, whilst the pre-war regulars made colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors were many years younger than the required age for emergency officers; in fact, many pre-war regulars were created majors at the tender ages of 27 or 28, with considerably less than 10 years of any kind of service.

When the single promotion list was prepared the emergency officers again suffered and lost. The act provides in substance that the emergency lieutenant colonels and majors may be assigned positions on the list higher up, but not above any pre-war officer of the Regular Army of greater age. And the study on the questions of promotion and retirement sent out by the War Department in 1927, following the request of Congress, states in several places that the intention was, and that it was so done, that these emergency officers were in every case placed up the list as far as possible and until they were blocked by a former Regular officer of greater age. But an inspection of the original promotion list shows this was not actually done; in almost every case the emergency lieutenant colonels and majors were blocked on the promotion list by a former Regular officer of lesser age or by officers of the Philippine Scouts. These were not considered Regular Army officers, and, moreover, at about that time both the Judge Advocate General and the Attorney General had held against promoting Philippine Scout officers to majors and placing them as such on the promotion list. (See opinion Attorney General (manuscript) March 28, 1922, quoted in Digest of Opinions of Judge Advocate General, 1922, pp. 84–85.)

Then in the arranging of the captains and lieutenants on the promotion list they were all jumbled and scrambled together in one lot, with the result that emergency officers appointed captains are now ranked and passed by over 1,000 former provisional officers of the Regular Army who were lieutenants on the day these emergency officers were appointed captains.

Another injustice and discrimination against the emergency officers was that those appointed when over 45 years of age, if retired for physical disability, would only receive retired pay at the rate of 4 per cent for each year of service, and not the full 75 per cent the pre-war Regular would receive. But Congress has already fairly and justly removed this last discrimination. It can now partially offset the others by making the pay act say what they intended it should in the beginning.

Briefly speaking, the bill under discussion (H. R. 10436; S. 3569) merely provides that the lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains should retain the respective 20, 14, and 7 years' service for pay purposes allowed them by the pay act to put them in the fifth, fourth, and third pay periods. This was clearly the intention of Congress. The pay act provides that the sixth period embraces regular colonels with over 26 years' service and the emergency officers appointed colonels, so it gives these emergency officers 26 years for pay purposes. It also provides that when an emergency officer is promoted to colonel he goes into the sixth pay period, irrespective of his length of service; but a regular officer promoted to colonel must have 26 years' service to go into the sixth pay period, which he would have in practically every case. So the emergency officer here has service given him for pay purposes. The fifth period embraces regular lieutenant colonels with over 20 years and less than 30 years' service and the emergency officers appointed lieutenant colonels, so it gives those emergency officers 20 years for pay purposes. It also provides that when an emergency officer is promoted to lieutenant colonel he goes into the fifth pay period, irrespective of his length of service; but a regular officer promoted to lieutenant colonel must have 20 years' service to go into the fifth pay period, which he would have in practically every case. So the emergency officer here has service given him for pay purposes. The fourth period embraces regular majors with over 14 and less than 23 years' service and the emergency officers appointed majors, so it gives these emergency officers 14 years for pay purposes. It also provides that when an emergency officer is promoted to major he goes into the fourth pay period, irrespective of his length of service; but a regular officer promoted to major must have 14 years' service to go into the fourth pay period, which he would have in practically every case. So the emergency officer here has service given him for pay purposes.

The third pay period embraces regular captains with over 7 and less than 17 years' service and the emergency officers appointed captains, so it gives these emergency officers 7 years for pay purposes.

Thus we see the emergency officers appointed lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains are given, respectively, 20, 14, and 7 years of service for pay purposes to start, and also service when promoted. But the emergency officers who are not promoted are not now authorized to keep the 20, 14, or 7 years given them to enable them to advance to higher pay periods. This Congress intended should be done, for the spirit and principle of the pay act is to allow those men to advance in pay periods who are not promoted.

Now, those not promoted are further discriminated against; are the ones not allowed to keep the service originally granted to them.

When the pay readjustment act of June 10, 1922, was enacted it was clearly intended by Congress that the officers from civil life appointed during and immediately after the World War in the grades of lieutenant colonel, major, and captain should, by reason of their age, education, experience, and World War service, be given a credit equivalent to actual service in the Army of 20, 14, and 7 years, respectively. That this is true and that these credits were actually so given is demonstrated by the following table, showing pay periods and rates of pay of all groups of these three grades, which appears at the back of each annual edition of the official Army Register published since the enactment of the law. I have inserted before each of the five groups under the head of "Lieutenant colonel," "Major," and "Captain," the letters in parentheses (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e):

	Pay period	Annual base pay
Lieutenant colonel:
(a) Over 30 years' service	6	$4,000
(b) Over 20, less than 30	5	3,500
(c) First appointment above captain	5	3,500
(d) Appointed under sec. 24, June 4, 1920	5	3,500
(e) Less than 20 years' service	4	3,000
Major:
(a) Over 23 years' service	5	3,500
(b) Over 14, less than 23 years	4	3,000
(c) First appointment above second lieutenant	4	3,000
(d) Appointed under sec. 24, act of June 4, 1920	4	3,000
(e) Less than 14 years' service	3	2,400
Captain:
(a) Over 17 years' service	4	3,000
(b) Over 7, less than 17 years	3	2,400
(c) First appointment above second lieutenant	3	2,400
(d) Present rank July 1, 1920, or earlier	3	2,400
(e) Less than 7 years' service	2	2,000

The pay periods and rates of pay of lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains of groups (a), (b), and (e) apply to prewar officers of the Regular Army, and the pay periods and rates of pay of officers of groups (c) and (d) apply to officers from civil life coming into the Regular Army. Officers from civil life appointed colonels, four only left, were placed in sixth pay period. Officers from civil life appointed lieutenant colonels, only 16 in number, were placed in fifth pay period, with base pay of $3,500 per annum. Officers from civil life appointed majors were placed in fourth pay period with base pay of $3,000 per annum. Officers from civil life appointed captains were placed in third pay period with base pay of $2,400 per annum. The table clearly shows that all officers from civil life appointed in the grade of lieutenant colonel in the Regular Army were credited with the equivalent of 20 years' actual service for the purpose of fixing their pay periods and rate of annual base pay; all appointed in the grade of major were credited with the equivalent of 14 years' actual service, and all appointed in the grade of captain with the equivalent of 7 years' actual service. This is doubly demonstrated by the pay periods and rates of pay provided by the pay act for lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains of group (e). Lieutenant colonels of less than 20 years' service, majors of less than 14 years' actual service, and captains of less than 7 years' actual service, all of whom were prewar officers, were given a lower pay period with lower rates of pay than were given to officers from civil life who were appointed lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains. Now let us see how the pay act has actually operated. Take the case of the major appointed from civil life, for example: The average age was around 43 years, and although he was given the credit and equivalent of 14 years' actual service at the time of his original appointment, the effect of this credit for service stopped then and there unless he should be promoted. With some exceptions, those who are retired at the age of 64 will never advance to the fifth pay period, as, under the operation of the pay act, a major must have 23 years of actual commissioned service before he can advance to the fifth pay period by years of service. He will go out by way of retirement in the grade of major at 64 years of age before he can count 23 years of service. The same is true of the lieutenant colonel as to years of service. They must be promoted to advance a period. I think it can be truthfully said such was not the intention or the expectation of the committee of Congress which framed the pay act of June 10, 1922. There is no sort of reason why these lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains appointed from civil life and who were given the respective credits of 20, 14, and 7 years' service should not get the benefit of this credit for advancing to a higher pay period when not promoted.

H. R. 10436 accomplishes this simple act of justice and nothing more. It has nothing to do with the promotion or retirement questions, does not alter the promotion list, or lineal list, does not change the rates of pay or allowances, and does not allow these granted years to count for longevity pay.

The emergency lieutenant colonel, major, and captain who, called by his country's needs, came into the Army from civil life, on account of this unjust effect of the pay act receives less by $50 to $100 per month than the pre-war officer (except those in group (e)) of the same rank. The emergency officer is from 15 to 20 years older on the average than the pre-war officers of group (e), has greater demands upon him, and therefore should have more pay. Some pre-war majors are actually receiving more pay than some emergency colonels and lieutenant colonels. It is evident that these officers coming in from civil life and now in the grades of lieutenant colonel, major, and captain must have some relief. There are 1,231 of them, including officers of the Medical Corps, veterinarians, and chaplains.

There are many Members of the present Congress, both in the Senate and in the House, who were officers in the World War, as well as several high officials of the War Department. It may be that they have not realized how they would have fared in the matter of pay and promotion, if they had sought and obtained a commission in the Army after the World War, how they would feel if thus treated.

I do not believe that any just cause of dissatisfaction can possibly arise among the other officers in various pay periods who are not included in the provisions of H. R. 10436. The colonels are not included, because all of them are now in the highest-pay period; nothing more can be given them under the pay act; there are only four of them. The lieutenants are not included, because all emergency officers appointed to these grades have already been promoted one or two grades, or advanced one or two pay periods, and are in the third or captain's pay period already.

The youngest pre-war lieutenant colonels all have now more than 20 years of actual service and have been advanced to the fifth pay period. The last officer on the list of majors, recently commissioned, has had more than 13 years of actual service; he is in group (e) of foregoing table, and is only 36 years of age. The pre-war officers of this group are on an average nearly 20 years younger than the officers from civil life of the same rank, and have fewer demands upon their pay. All of the captains, both pre-war and from civil life, have had more than 10 years of actual service. There can, of course, be no ground of complaint from the second lieutenants.

H. R. 10436 benefits those who should be benefited, need it most, and discriminates against no one. It does not entirely equalize the pay of all officers in the three grades, as the prewar officer still has the advantage in increased pay for length of actual service. It does not give "constructive service," or anything new, but simply gives to the emergency officer from civil life the right to add to the equivalent credit already given, the length of time of his actual service, and thereby advance to the next higher pay period.

The additional annual cost should not stand in the way of this act of immediate justice nor prevent giving to these officers from civil life what Congress intended that they should have. This additional annual cost will decrease yearly, the increase brought by this bill will decrease, as some emergency officers advance by years or die. Nobody is hurt by this bill, 1,231 officers are benefited, the morale of the Army will be greatly improved, it will do much to allay the present agitation, dissatisfaction, and discontent. By all means it should pass; opposition to it appears small and narrow.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, first I wish to compliment the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] for the fine work he has done and the persistency shown in getting the McNary-Woodruff bill before the House of Representatives, as I compliment another distinguished son of Michigan, Mr. KETCHAM, for his work, always with an appreciation of agriculture and the many problems of the farmers.

The McNary-Woodruff bill enlarges the scope of the Weeks Act and the Clarke-McNary bill, as well as it establishes the national fiscal program in the reforestation movement.

On March 1, I addressed the House of Representatives setting forth the accomplishments under the Clarke-McNary law for reforestation. To-day I shall speak of one of the by-products of that reforestation movement. Its general subject will be "Bending twigs and inclining trees."

Conservation, stripped of details, as I view it, means the outlining of a policy and the enactment of that policy into law that seeks to save God Almighty's endowments from unwise utilization from the profiteering of the plunderbund; the wastefulness of the wanton, selfish, or ignorant, and the utilization of these endowments so that we, the trustees of the to-morrows, shall not seem to have forgotten the children of the to-morrows.

Reforestation is a big part of that conservation program.

The Weeks Act and the Clarke-McNary law establish our national reforestation policy.

I will not touch on the big picture with 81,000,000 idle acres in the United States crying for reforestation—an area as large as the States of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware—nor will I touch upon my own State of New York, with almost 5,000,000 idle acres, and the call of duty to every one of us to take at least 1 acre and make it ours and our children's, dedicated to service by growing trees.

The United States, with one-twelfth of the population of the world, consumes one-half of the world's supply of lumber.

Neither is it my purpose to paint you the picture of the tragedy of our denuded hills, beauty gone, serviceability dissipated, floods abounding, soil disappearing, and gullies slowly being evolved into great ravines.

Nor is it my purpose to remind you of the death, disease, and destruction that followed the Mississippi flood, as well as that of Vermont, nor do I need to tell you that somewhere in the plan of flood prevention is reforestation.

Great volunteer organizations are carrying on their work, the President of the United States and the Governor General of Canada have again joined in a proclamation for American forest week, April 22–28, inclusive, and pioneer organizations are taking their part unselfishly in this constructive Christian effort.

It is my purpose, however, to point you to the work and the interest of the children in reforestation, and how you and I can build our immortal monuments if we want to "bend twigs and incline trees."

This is my introduction to a book the American Tree Association is distributing free; that is my text:

HOW ABOUT YOU, DADDY?

Every regular dad should want his boy to know trees; in order to help the boy, dad must know the different varieties of trees; any book, conference, or association that will help dad to this information should reflect itself in the boy if dad is, as he should be, a chum and companion to the boy.

Regular dads teach their boys, through long walks in God's great out-of-doors laboratory, many of nature's mysteries.

Trees, as forest cover for wild life; trees, as protectors of our hillsides from erosion; trees, as retarders of the run-off from the rains; trees, as helpers in keeping our streams more even in their flow, therefore better swimming holes, better skating, better fishing, better boys.

Let's be regular dads and each year go in partnership with sonny and sister in planting trees on some idle acre.

To the to-morrows made better for the children of the to-morrows by idle acres set to work growing trees for sonny and sister is a part of my mission, for I want to be a regular dad.

How about you, Daddy?

My theory is that one-half the criticism of our young people and their habits, of their disregard of customs and disobedience, is due to parents failing to meet their obligation as parents by not more fully entering into the life and play of their young people. One way daddies, in particular, can help in "bending twigs" is becoming partners with sonny or sister in planting trees.

We are our brothers' keepers whether we will it or not. How much more are we the keepers of our very own? Parents can help bend their twigs and thus incline their trees, but it takes time, thought, sometimes sacrifice, and always effort; if there be parents who are unwilling to do these things they are not fit to be parents. Elbert Hubbard once said: "We are all children in God's great kindergarten." Let us live that philosophy and make our beginning outside of our homes by entering into a closer fellowship with our children on some idle acre growing trees in God's great laboratory. Willingness is the key word; terms of intimacy and good fellowship with our children and God's universe the spirit.

Who has seen any canvas touched by a Corot or Innes that equals in beauty the autumn tints of sumac or soft maple dressed in matchless reds, or the green tints of the sugar maple and oak, or the golden yellows of shellbark hickory or fast-disappearing chestnut, with here and there some lonesome pine or hemlock, that make our hills the Master's masterpiece in colors?

(a) In God's great out of doors "the old order changeth"; there are left the rude scars on Mother Nature's face to tell their tragic story, if we know Mother Nature well enough to interpret her signs. Some poet had the spirit of the scene in mind when he wrote:

So he wandered away and away
With nature the good, old nurse
Who sang to him day by day
The songs of the universe;
And whenever the way seemed long
Or his heart began to fail,
She sang a more wonderful song
Or told a more marvelous tale.

An Agassiz studies our rocks and earth's structure to give us his legacy in "bending twigs" in the fundamentals of geology, and Lowell says of him:

The beauty of his better self lives on
In minds he touches with fire, in many an eye
He trained to truth's exact severity;
He was a teacher; why be grieved for him
Whose living word still stimulates the air?
In endless file shall loving scholars come
The glow of his transmitted touch to share.

A Humboldt turns his God-given talents to the study of mother nature, and the fundamentals of physical geography become the inheritance of our twigs. So daddies of to-day and granddaddies of to-morrow can help incline their twigs if they are willing to make the effort.

It is not some one particular tree that stands out in my mind, wonderful and lovely as most trees are, but it is dad and mother's partnership with sonny or sister planting trees on idle acres, developing real acquaintance, creating better understanding, promoting camaraderie, generating confidence, building character and the service-rendering spirit in children until there dawns again the picture Bryant saw when he wrote:

Before these fields were shorn and tilled
Full to the brims our rivers flowed,
The melody of waters filled
The fresh and boundless wood,
And torrents dashed and rivulets played
And fountains spouted in the shade.

The mission of man is constructive service. The first test is within our own homes, with our own, and we are measured primarily by the sincere efforts we make in bending our own twigs, being real partners with sonny and sister in character-building, appealing enterprises, with service as the watchword and daddy planting trees with sonny and sister in such an enterprise.

Let me cite you an example or two of what is doing in New York State that but supplements the efforts of Michigan, for instance, in the cooperative extension work for the boys and girls. John Lennox, of my own county, has been getting marvelous results with our boys and girls. At North Franklin the Ouleout Valley 4-H Club had a meeting last fall and 60 boys and girls sat down to a bountiful Thanksgiving dinner; there was community singing and Paul D. Kelleter, of New York State College of Forestry, spoke to the boys and girls and their parents, and then Will Miller, of the local Rod and Gun Club praised them for the good they have done in their planting projects in the Ouleout Valley. Then came the outstanding Superintendent of Schools W. C. King, with the awarding of prizes. Thirty-nine reforestation plots judged by the Rod and Gun Club members were scored on preparation and adaption 15 per cent; appearance, 50 per cent; protection, 15 per cent; interest and record, 20 per cent.

John Lennox, for Delaware County, reports of the 4-H club an increase in members of 81 per cent to complete the project work of last year. "Bending twigs and inclining trees" is a big job, but I want you here in Congress to know that we are trying to do our part. All we ask of you is to give us the national leadership and we will cooperate.

Here is another example: John and Mac Hall decide to dedicate grandmother's farm to growing trees as the best investment they can make of their savings. John is age 11 and Mac 13, so by doing errands and chores they accumulate $30 and invest $20 in buying five thousand 3-year-old white-pine transplants. Grandmother's farm was given to the boys for this purpose. They then fenced off these trees to keep them from the cattle and the neighbors are planning a field day to assist the boys in their work. "Bending twigs and inclining trees," Lord bless you, we all ought to be working on that job.

Another example: Prof. Sheldon Brink told me of some boys in the Walton school who were willing to plant trees if they could get them, so I bought for each boy 1,000 trees, and received last fall the following letter:

DEAR SIR: We wish to express our appreciation of your recent efforts in procuring from the conservation commission 8,700 trees, which we have planted on our farm at home.

It is our purpose to guard carefully these trees from fire and animals, to take an honest interest and sincere pride in their future growth and development, and to always recall with gratitude the person who was instrumental in securing them for us.

LEIGH H. SEELY.	STURGIS B. GOODRICH.
LEROY ROBINSON.	RAYMOND BENEDICT.
HARLAND FRANCISCO.	ROBERT F. LOHER.
WILFORD J. DOICE.	GLENN C. MILLER.
WINFIELD R. BAXTER.

So I want to appeal to all of you as parents, as trustees for all the youngsters, your own, everybody's, as good citizens, interested in your schools and communities, to take some little idle, neglected acre or tract and join with the youngsters in planting trees and watch the youthful developments in worthwhile traits—ideals of service.

If you want to be hard-boiled, hard-hearted bargainers, I can still commend the enterprise on lands more suitable for growing trees than for other agricultural purposes. It will return more in dollars and cents with but little care and protection—a slow but certain income that has been the experience of hundreds of years in Europe, but in other ways it will pay back, as a recreation center, as a sanctuary for wild life, in the constructive tendencies also it will build in youth. The cost of an acre of such land is not as much as the cost of a Ford tire, nor will the cost in purchasing and planting trees thereon be as much as the replacement of almost any part of that Ford; and so the story goes of the possibilities of youngsters, with dad's encouragement and help, being inclined in nature's laboratory.

Nature's God invites you and yours to learn its lesson, and may you hear "the still small voice" of the Master as you study His works.

THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 487) to amend an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of the act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, as amended, is amended:

(a) By striking out the period at the end of paragraph "Second," in the case of food, and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and adding thereafter the following clause: "or if it be in a container made, formed, or shaped so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser as to the quantity, quality, size, kind, or origin of the food contained therein"; and

(b) By adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Fifth. If in the package form, and irrespective of whether or not the quantity of the contents be plainly and conspicuously marked on the outside of the package in terms of weight, measure, or numerical count, as provided in paragraph 'Third,' the package be less than filled with the food it purports to contain in such a manner as to deceive or mislead purchasers. In construing and applying this provision reasonable variations shall be permitted and also due allowance shall be made for the subsequent shrinkage or expansion of the food which results from a natural or other cause beyond reasonable control."

SEC. 2. Such act of June 30, 1906, as amended, is amended by adding to the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That this act may be cited as the 'food and drugs act.'"

SEC. 3. No fine, imprisonment confiscation, refusal of admission or delivery, or other penalty shall be enforced for any violation of this amendatory act occurring within six months after its passage.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. In line 3, page 3, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 3, line 3, at the end of the line, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HORTICULTURAL EXPERIMENT WORK IN SOUTHERN GREAT PLAINS AREA

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 405) providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the southern Great Plains area.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to cause such shade, ornamental, fruit, and shelter belt trees, shrubs, and vines as are adapted to the conditions and needs of the southern Great Plains area, comprised of those parts of the States of Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas, Oklahoma, and New Mexico lying west of the ninety-eighth meridian and east of the 5,000-foot contour line, to be propagated at one of the existing field stations of the Department of Agriculture in such area, and seedlings and cuttings and seeds of such trees, shrubs, and vines to be distributed free of charge under such regulations as he may prescribe for experimental and demonstration purposes within such area.

SEC. 2. That for carrying out the purposes of this act, including purchase of land and erection of buildings, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 2, line 8, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$35,000."

"SEC. 3. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated each fiscal year thereafter necessary appropriations to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry on the experiments contemplated by this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. Does the gentleman think that the Secretary of Agriculture would know better how to distribute these plants in his district than he himself would know? Why is it left to the Secretary of Agriculture to do it?

Mr. HAUGEN. This bill is to encourage plant distribution.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but would the Secretary of Agriculture know better than the Representatives of the several States where to distribute the plants?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman means to let the Members have the distribution?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Take the district of the gentleman from Iowa; would not he know better where to distribute these plants than the Secretary of Agriculture? We had a bill pending here for a long time presented by the former distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee—Mr. Kahn—which was a good bill. It left the distribution of captured German cannon to the membership of Congress, but instead of doing that in the bill we finally passed we put it in the hands of the Government. I have had complaint after complaint from my part of the country that they could not get proper recognition, and we are blamed for it. When there is a distribution of State matters let the governor distribute them. When it is a distribution of Federal matters—I do not care what it is—let the Congressmen do it. If it is a distribution of Federal patronage, let Congressmen distribute it, and not let some governor in some States take it over. That is my position.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is a difference of opinion as to that. We are following the policy that has heretofore been laid down.

Mr. BLANTON. I think I would know better where to put them in my district—and my State is mentioned—than the Secretary of Agriculture, for I know more about it.

Mr. CLARKE. Is that because the gentleman is a candidate for the Senate?

Mr. BLANTON. That makes no difference. I knew that when I was not a candidate.

Mr. GARBER. In reply to the inquiry by the gentleman from Texas, this distribution by the department would only be made as the type is developed by direct contact with the Department of Agriculture in the form of an agreement as to soil, cultivation, care of the trees, submitting to seasonable inspection by the department, and so forth.

Mr. BLANTON. The point I was inveighing against was this: I wish every Member of Congress could read over every year—just as they read the speech of Champ Clark before the Press Club about keeping Congressmen here a long time—I wish they could read the speech of my colleague, Mr. LANHAM, on having "a Federal agent in every home." That is what I want to get away from. We are getting them all over our district—Federal agents representing the Agricultural Department. There are entirely too many Federal agents throughout the States.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman will admit that the farm agents are important and a necessary factor in the encouragement of agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FOR THE PROMOTION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11074) to promote the agriculture of the United States by expanding in the foreign field the service now rendered by the United States Department of Agriculture in acquiring and diffusing useful information regarding agriculture, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of encouraging and promoting the agriculture of the United States and assisting American farmers to adjust their operations and practices to meet world conditions, the Secretary of Agriculture shall—

(a) Acquire information regarding world competition and demand for agricultural products and the production, marketing, and distributing of said products in foreign countries and disseminate the same through agricultural extension agencies and by such other means as may be deemed advisable.

(b) Investigate abroad farm management and any other economic phases of the agricultural industry and, in so far as is necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, conduct abroad any activities, including the demonstration of standards for cotton, wheat, and other American agricultural products, in which the Department of Agriculture is now authorized or in the future may be authorized to engage. Nothing contained herein shall be construed as prohibiting the Department of Agriculture from conducting abroad any activity for which authority for thus conducting it may exist.

SEC. 2. (a) The present representatives of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture now stationed abroad shall be officers of the foreign agricultural service of the United States, and the Secretary of Agriculture may appoint other officers in said service from time to time in accordance with civil-service procedure. All such officers shall constitute the foreign agricultural service of the United States, and shall be known as agricultural attachés, assistant agricultural attachés, or by such other titles as may be deemed appropriate by the Secretary of Agriculture. Any officer in said service, when designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, shall, through the Department of State, be regularly and officially attached to the diplomatic mission of the United States in the country in which he is to be stationed, or to the consulate of the United States, as the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate. If any such officer is to be stationed in a country where there is no diplomatic mission or consulate of the United States, appropriate recognition and standing, with full facilities for discharging his official duties, shall be arranged by the Department of State. The Secretary of State may reject the name of any such officer if, in his judgment, the attachment of such officer to the diplomatic mission or consulate at the post designated would be prejudicial to the public policy of the United States.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture shall appoint the officers of the foreign agricultural service to such grades as he may establish, with salaries in those grades comparable to those paid other officers of the Government for analogous foreign service.

(c) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to promote or demote in grade or class, to increase or decrease within the salary range fixed for the class the compensation of, and to separate from the service, officers of the foreign agricultural service, but in so doing the Secretary shall take into consideration records of efficiency.

(d) No officer of the foreign agricultural service shall be considered as having the character of a public minister.

(e) Any officer of the foreign agricultural service may be assigned for duty in the United States for a period of not more than three years without change in grade, class, or salary, or with such change as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct.

(f) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay the expenses of transportation and subsistence of officers in the foreign agricultural service of the United States and their immediate families in going to and returning from their posts under orders from the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture is further authorized, whenever he deems it in the public interest, to order to the United States on his official leave of absence any foreign agricultural service officer who has performed three years or more of continuous service abroad: Provided, That the expenses of transportation and subsistence of such officers and their immediate families in traveling to their homes in the United States and return shall be paid under the same rules and regulations applicable in the case of officers going to and returning from their posts under orders of the Secretary of Agriculture when not on leave: Provided further, That while in the United States the services of such officers shall be available for such duties in the Department of Agriculture and elsewhere in the United States as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe. Any officer in the foreign agricultural service, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, may be given leave of absence with pay for not to exceed 30 days for any one year, which may be taken in the United States or elsewhere, accumulative for three years, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. (a) Subject to the requirements of the civil service laws, and the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to appoint, fix the compensation of, promote, demote, and separate from the service such clerks and other assistants for officers of the foreign agricultural service as he may deem necessary.

(b) When authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture, officers of the foreign agricultural service may employ, regardless of their citizenship, in a foreign country from time to time, fix the compensation of, and separate from the service such clerical and other assistants as may be necessary.

SEC. 4. (a) Any officer, assistant, clerk, or employee of the Department of Agriculture, while on duty outside of the continental limits of the United States and away from the post to which he is assigned, shall be entitled to receive his necessary traveling expenses and his actual expenses for subsistence, or a per diem in lieu of subsistence, equal to that paid to other officers of the Government when engaged in analogous foreign service.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture may authorize any officer of the foreign agricultural service to fix, in an amount not exceeding the allowance fixed for such officer, an allowance for actual subsistence, or a per diem allowance in lieu thereof, for any clerical or other assistant employed by such officer under subdivision (b) of section 3 when such clerical or other assistant is engaged in travel outside the continental limits of the United States and away from the post to which he is assigned.

(c) Any officer, assistant, clerk, or employee of the foreign agricultural service, while on duty within the continental limits of the United States, shall be entitled to receive the traveling expenses and actual expenses incurred for subsistence, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, authorized by law.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Agriculture may make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, State, Territory, District, or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, cooperative and other farm organizations, or any person, and shall have power to make such expenditures for rent outside the District of Columbia, for printing, telegrams, telephones, law books, books of reference, maps, publications, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel and subsistence allowances, and other supplies and expenses as shall be necessary to the administration of the act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere. With the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, an officer of the foreign agricultural service may enter into leases for office quarters, and may pay rent, telephone, subscriptions to publications, and other charges incident to the conduct of his office and the discharge of his duties, in advance in any foreign country where custom or practice requires payment in advance.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to take the time of the House in discussing the merits of H. R. 11074, a bill to promote the agriculture of the United States by expanding in the foreign field the service now rendered by the United States Department of Agriculture in acquiring and diffusing useful information regarding agriculture, but do feel that the importance of the work authorized by this bill requires a short statement concerning the measure.

The bill, in substantially the same form, was introduced in the Sixty-ninth Congress and was passed by the House of Representatives on April 7, 1926, as H. R. 10129. Additions of essential administrative features were made in the present bill to make the foreign agricultural service of the Department of Agriculture uniform with the Foreign Service of the Department of State and the foreign service of the Department of Commerce in order to avoid all duplication of effort so far as possible. This bill is in conformity with the spirit and letter of the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture and puts into permanent legislative form authority now carried in the annual appropriation bill.

Secretary W. M. Jardine, of the Department of Agriculture, and Secretary Herbert Hoover, of the Department of Commerce, sent a joint letter to Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN, chairman Committee on Agriculture, under date of March 10, 1926, voicing approval of H. R. 10129, then pending before the committee. In addition, under date of February 1, 1928, Secretary Hoover addressed a letter to Hon. W. M. Jardine, Secretary of Agriculture, from which I quote:

> The draft of "A bill to promote the agriculture of the United States by expanding in the foreign field the service now rendered by the United States Department of Agriculture," as submitted to this department by your office on January 31, 1928, is a helpful step toward more uniform and better administration in that it places the proposed staff of the Department of Agriculture on a comparable footing with the Foreign Commerce Service as defined in the Hoch Act of March 3, 1927. It seems to me that the passage of this measure will contribute materially toward more effective collaboration between the two services, and I hope, therefore, that it will receive early and favorable consideration by Congress.

In the Sixty-eighth Congress a statement indorsing the Ketcham bill was signed by 19 representative leaders of American agriculture. Among the organizations represented in this signed statement were:

> The National Grange, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, National Wool Growers' Association, American Dairy Federation, National Dairy Union, American Wheat Growers' Association, National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, National Board of Farm Organizations, and other National and State organizations.

American agriculture requires a unified world service. It can not render an adequate service to the agricultural producers of the United States without extending its activities into foreign fields. Foreign competition and demand directly affect about 90 per cent of American agricultural products entering into market channels.

Using wheat as an example we find that the size of the foreign wheat crop and the foreign demand added to similar information as to the prospects for production and consumption of wheat in the United States is required to give a complete picture of the wheat situation.

The Department of Agriculture collects the necessary information concerning the United States and must have similar information concerning foreign countries in order to render an adequate service to American producers. To understand competition to be met from foreign wheats it is necessary to have information concerning the character of wheats produced and the uses of wheat or wheat flour in foreign countries. Marketing may be said properly to begin with production. Knowledge of the character and qualities of the wheat produced in competing countries is necessary to producers of the United States in determining what kind of wheat they shall produce. Production and marketing are so tied together that it would be impracticable to separate the administration of services relating to production and marketing, and certainly impracticable to separate the economic service relating to foreign competition and demand from that relating to production and marketing in the United States. Situations arise on foreign markets when quick advice will turn loss into profit.

The Department of Agriculture utilizes to the fullest extent the agencies of other departments of the Government operating abroad. All information of value to agriculture in the reports of the Consular and Commercial Services is assembled, interpreted for the American farmer, and made available by the Department of Agriculture to agricultural interests in the United States at the earliest possible moment after its receipt.

Through arrangements with the State Department, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics is now coordinating the reporting on agricultural subjects by the more than 400 American consuls distributed throughout the world. Over 600 consular reports on agricultural subjects are being received monthly. So the Department of Agriculture is in a position to organize and direct the activities of a foreign service for agriculture and to utilize this service in promoting the welfare of American agriculture. It has a large corps of scientific men to advise and assist foreign agricultural service officers in their work and to make full use of the results of this work. It has organized machinery, such as widely distributed branch offices, leased-wire systems, and radio, for rapidly conveying information to the producers. A beginning has been made, channels established.

This bill will make permanent and more effective this service to the American farmer. Utilizing all of the existing facilities of the Department of Agriculture, the foreign agricultural service will thus be in contact with every agricultural cooperative association and private marketing organization in this country; the Department of Agriculture will disseminate through them information and data concerning foreign production and market consumption made available by the extended service provided in H. R. 11074.

SPREAD OF EUROPEAN CORN BORER

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 484) to amend section 10 of the plant quarantine act approved August 20, 1912.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the plant quarantine act, approved August 20, 1912 (37 Stat. L. 315), as amended by the act of March 4, 1917 (39 Stat. L. 1165), be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"That any employee of the Department of Agriculture, authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act and furnished with and wearing a suitable badge for identification, who has probable cause to believe that any person coming into the United States, or any vehicle, receptacle, boat, ship, or vessel coming from any country or countries or moving interstate, possesses, carries, or contains any nursery stock, plants, plant products, or other articles the entry or movement of which in interstate or foreign commerce is prohibited or restricted by the provisions of this act, or by any quarantine or order of the Secretary of Agriculture issued or promulgated pursuant thereto, shall have power to stop and, without warrant, to inspect, search, and examine such person, vehicle, receptacle, boat, ship, or vessel, and to seize, destroy, or otherwise dispose of, such nursery stock, plants, plant products, or other articles found to be moving or to have been moved in interstate commerce or to have been brought into the United States in violation of this act or of such quarantine or order."

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend section 10 of the plant quarantine act, approved August 20, 1912. No authority is now given in the act to stop in transportation quarantined articles which are pest carriers. Such movement in violation of plant quarantine is usually in ignorance of the restrictions but involves the greatest danger in long-distance spread of the pests concerned. The act now provides merely for punishment of violators. Such punishment is of little value in preventing spread when as indicated the contraband articles can not be seized or safeguarded either in movement or at destination. What is wanted is to stop the movement of dangerous articles before it is completed. That is the purpose of this bill. It provides that any employee of the Department of Agriculture, authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act and furnished with and wearing a suitable badge for identification, who has probable cause to believe that any person coming into the United States or any vehicle, receptacle, boat, ship, or vessel coming from any country or countries or moving interstate possesses, carries, or contains any nursery stock, plants, plant products, or other articles the entry or movement of which in interstate or foreign commerce is prohibited by this act shall have power to stop and without warrant to inspect, search, and examine such person, vehicle, or vessel and to seize, destroy, or otherwise dispose of such articles found to be moving in violation of the plant quarantine act. The urgent need for this amendment is for the prevention of the spread of the European corn borer. Up to this time the department has been attempting to exercise such control by common consent, but there is a growing percentage of motorists and others who refuse to submit to inspection. Such refusals totaled last year upward of 500 motorists from the corn-borer area alone. Last season there were seized in such movement from the corn-borer area some 125,000 ears of corn, the greater part of which was infested by the European corn borer. In many instances this corn was to have been transported interstate and in three instances as far west as Iowa. Unless such movement can be more adequately controlled it may well nullify the large expenditures the Government and States are making to prevent spread of this pest.

The bill not only has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture but is introduced at the request of the department.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HORTICULTURAL EXPERIMENT IN DRY-LAND REGIONS

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2569) providing for horticultural experiments and demonstration work in the semiarid or dry-land regions of the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause such shade, ornamental, fruit, and shelter-belt trees, shrubs, vines, and vegetables as are adapted to the conditions and needs of the semiarid or dry-land regions of the United States, to be propagated at an experiment station of the Department of Agriculture to be established at or near Cheyenne, Wyo., and seedlings and cuttings and seeds of such trees, shrubs, vines, and vegetables to be distributed free of charge under such regulations as he may prescribe for experimental and demonstration purposes within the semiarid or dry-land regions of the United States.

SEC. 2. That for carrying out the purposes of this act, including the erection of buildings, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated each fiscal year thereafter necessary appropriations to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry on the experiments contemplated by this act.

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a few words in respect to this bill. This bill is one establishing a station similar to others that have been instituted in various parts of the country, following out the general policy of developing shade, ornamental, fruit, and shelter trees, shrubs, vines, and vegetables and growths of like character. This work is very necessary in arid and semiarid regions, particularly on the high plateaus east of the Rocky Mountains. There is one such station which has been in existence for some time at Mandan, N. Dak., very far to the north of Cheyenne, where this station is to be located. I believe there is a bill for the establishment of a similar one far to the south, perhaps in Oklahoma. This particular station will find a long-felt want in the high semiarid country of the Central West, and is so situated with reference to highway transportation and the transcontinental railroad lines that it would serve a very large area. I may add that the present facilities for this character of work in this portion of the West are limited to the output of the Mandan station, which is utterly inadequate to supply the demand. When I speak of the demand I do not mean that these stations are furnishing great quantities of trees and shrubbery, vines, and vegetables. They are not in competition with private business. These stations are for the purpose of improving the quality and ascertaining and developing growths of this kind which are delivered on request in small quantities to settlers and residents, who are thus enabled to develop the larger fields of growth. It is a very beneficial bill and will fill a great need in the semiarid plateaus of the central western country. No part of the work of the Department of Agriculture is more important or directly beneficial than that of these experimental stations, and this one will be of special value to a great area and a great number of people not now served and who can not be sufficiently served by the existing stations and facilities.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BEAL NURSERY, EAST TAWAS, MICH.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 10374) for the acquisition of lands for an addition to the Beal Nursery, at East Tawas, Mich.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to use so much of the funds now or hereafter appropriated for tree planting on the national forests or of the funds now or hereafter appropriated to carry out the provisions of section 4 of the act of June 7, 1924 (34 Stat. L. 653), as amended by the acts of March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1127), and April 13, 1926 (Public, No. 102, 69th Cong.), entitled "An act to provide for the protection of forest lands, for the reforestation of denuded areas, for the extension of national forests, and for other purposes," in order to promote the continuous production of timber on lands chiefly suitable therefor, as may be necessary to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, all or any lots of block 16 in Newman's addition to the city of East Tawas, Mich., as an addition to the Beal Nursery in East Tawas, Mich.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "so much" and insert "not to exceed $2,500."

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

ALLOWANCE IN THE ACCOUNTS OF A DISBURSING OFFICER

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it shall be in order to consider the bill H. R. 8968. It carries an authorization of an allowance of $80 in the accounts of a disbursing agent of the Department of Agriculture. It is recommended by the department.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it proper to take up private bills on Calendar Wednesday.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the majority leader if it is contemplated to take up the Private Calendar to-day?

Mr. TILSON. Before we decide what calendar we shall take up I think the membership of the House should be more generally represented than it is at the present time. I therefore move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will summon the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 49]

Johnson, S. Dak.	Montague	Steagall

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-six Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that further proceedings under the call be suspended. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Agriculture has completed its business under the Calendar Wednesday rule much sooner than was anticipated by that committee or by any of us. In view of this fact, I moved to call the House together in order to submit a unanimous request concerning the order of business. I ask unanimous consent that during the remainder of to-day the Consent Calendar may be called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that during the remainder of the day the Consent Calendar be called. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. TILSON. My reason for making this request is that the Consent Calendar is quite long; so long, indeed, that it could not be completed in one day if proper consideration were given to the bills on it, and especially if suspensions were granted; so that the remaining bills would have to wait two weeks longer. I think, therefore, that the remainder of the time to-day could not be better utilized than by calling the Consent Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. This can be done only by unanimous consent?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. That is the reason why I am making this request for unanimous consent, and that is the reason why I desired that a full membership of the House should be here.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think it is fair to the few men who study these bills to call up that Consent Calendar without their knowledge? Some of them are absent. I have in mind a man who does hard work on these bills. He is not here and knows nothing about the calling up of that calendar to-day. Where it takes three objections to stop these bills by those who study them, probably you could not find those three this afternoon.

Mr. TILSON. On an occasion of this sort, where there is an objection, the bills should go over without prejudice.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman include in his unanimous-consent request the proviso that on a single objection they will be passed over? A few of us study these bills. I have my notes on these bills in my office. I must go over and get them before I can conscientiously pass upon a single bill that comes up.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman does not mean to intimate that the Members of the House generally do not study these bills?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that only a comparatively few Members have the time to study these bills.

Mr. SCHAFER. I challenge the gentleman's statement that he is the only man on the floor of the House who studies these bills.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not say that. I said that there are but a few Members who study these bills, and the gentleman knows that that is true.

Mr. TILSON. Bills called up on a day of this kind should not be passed if any one Member objects, because of the fact that any Member has the right at this stage to object to their being considered at all.

Mr. BLANTON. And I do not want to object if it can be avoided.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that whenever one objection is made to-day the bill shall go over.

Mr. BLANTON. With that amendment I shall not object.

Mr. TILSON. That is, when an objection is made to a bill the bill will be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not going to leave the statement just made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] go unchallenged and thus send notice to the country that the gentleman from Texas and perhaps only one or two other Members of the House watch these bills. It is not a fact.

Mr. BLANTON. How many will the gentleman say watch them?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say that nearly every Member of this House watches these bills. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. And studies the bills?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes. I do not intend to leave the gentleman from Texas give the impression that he and three or four other Members are the only ones who watch and study these bills. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. After they study them, do they object?

Mr. SCHAFER. There are many who object to bills, but as a rule a majority of the Members of the House do not enter frivolous objections, as the gentleman from Texas sometimes does.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, after the cyclone from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] has exploded let the Speaker put the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would not the situation be met if it were agreed now that bills on the calendar which have been objected to on a previous day shall not be called at all?

Mr. TILSON. I think the request should stand as I have made it, that where there is one objection then the bill may go over, unless the Member wishes to have it go off the calendar.

Mr. TEMPLE. The Member who objected before may not be present to-day at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again put the request of the gentleman from Connecticut, that during the remainder of the day it shall be in order to call up bills on the Consent Calendar and that when any one objection is made to any bill it go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished young friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] said a while ago that sometimes I made frivolous objections to bills. I do not make objections that are frivolous. I study carefully every bill that is reported from a committee, and I make it a rule never to object to any bill unless I have good, conscientious reasons for doing so.

It is a well-known fact that only a very few Members make a close study of the bills that are on the Private and Consent Calendars. And only a few Members here assume the responsibility of objecting to them. I commend my friend from Wisconsin for the good work he has been doing, and I intended in no way to minimize the importance of same. The Members of the House of Representatives know who look after these Private and Consent Calendars and make the objections. And they know that I was well within my rights in insisting that for this afternoon one objection should be sufficient to stop a bill and keep it from passing.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, his colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to ask unanimous consent that following the address of Mr. BUCHANAN the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that following the address of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this will not interfere materially with the conduct of business, general debate on the naval bill being in order to-morrow.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, it is understood that there will be no suspensions this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. Suspensions would not be in order in any case to-day.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9200) to provide for the appointment of three additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. One objection forces that action.

Mr. CAREW. Then it will require three objections the next time; and it was agreed that when one objection was made to a bill it would be passed over without prejudice?

The SPEAKER. No; it will require three objections next time.

Mr. CAREW. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not want to get into that position.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, to please the gentleman from New York, if he will ask that it go over without prejudice I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. CAREW. It has been passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. It will be precisely in the same situation the next time it is called that it is now.

Mr. TILSON. Just as if it had not been called at all.

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5774) to provide for the appointment of an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill may remain on the calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of one objection.

Mr. CAREW. When it has not been objected to heretofore and is not objected to here to-day? We simply ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. That is precisely the effect of one objection, under the request of the gentleman from Connecticut. The bill is passed over without prejudice and retains its place on the calendar.

BRIDGE AND ROAD ON THE HOOPA VALLEY RESERVATION, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 441) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge and road on the Hoopa Valley Reservation, Calif.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I had promised to make some study of this situation. This study I have not had a chance to complete, because I had not expected the calendar to be called to-day. I ask, therefore, that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8731) to authorize an appropriation for the construction of a road on the Lummi Indian Reservation, Wash.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, for the same reason I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, and retain its place on the calendar.

HAWAII NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10483) to revise the boundary of a portion of the Hawaii National Park on the island of Hawaii in the Territory of Hawaii.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Speaker, I had an understanding with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that there would be an amendment to this bill. The gentleman is not here, so I will have to ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

APPRAISAL OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5746) to authorize the appraisal of certain Government property, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Va., to be appraised, as provided for in said contract, by three persons as a preliminary to the purchase of said property by the contractor, the three appraisers to consist of one person selected by the Secretary of the Navy, one by the contractor, and the third by the two first so selected, as stipulated in the contract. The person selected and detailed by the Secretary of the Navy for said purpose, who shall be an officer of the Navy, and such persons as may be detailed by the Secretary to assist him, shall serve without additional compensation, except travel and subsistence in accordance with law. One-half of the fee and expenses of the third appraiser, not in excess of $10,000, as the Secretary may approve, shall be payable from the appropriation "Ordnance and ordnance stores," under the Navy Department, which is hereby made available for the purpose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

R. 10884) to amend the act entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the convention between the United States and Great Britain to regulate the level of Lake of the Woods concluded on the 24th day of February, 1925," approved May 22, 1926.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] what is the necessity of the bill?

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman why this city can not get the cannon under the act donating cannon from the Government?

Mr. McMILLAN. Because this cannon is a Confederate trophy.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to donate, without expense to the United States, to the city of Charleston, S. C., a smoothbore, muzzle-loading, bronze field gun, No. 124, captured from the Confederate forces, and now in the Watervliet Arsenal, Watervliet, N. Y.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CONSTRUCTION OF RECREATION PIER, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1665) to authorize the board of park commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco to construct a recreation pier at the foot of Van Ness Avenue, San Francisco, Calif.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this bill gives certain property in San Francisco of the United States to the city conditioned on a site being furnished by the city to take the place of the present site now used by the Transport Service. The record of the city of San Francisco for keeping its agreements with the United States is such that I would not feel safe in granting that permit unless the new site is first provided by San Francisco. I have this amendment to offer: Page 2, line 5, after the word "service," insert "and prior to the use of the recreation pier by the city of San Francisco." The bill seems to contemplate that that is to be done, but I want to make it certain. If that amendment is agreeable to those in charge of the bill, I have no objection.

Mr. WELCH of California. Mr. Speaker, this bill is in charge of my colleague, Mrs. KAHN, of the fourth congressional district. We have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The quartermaster's headquarters will have to be moved?

Mr. CRAMTON. This pier is used by the Transport Service, and section 2 provides that the permit shall be conditioned upon the relocation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The pier is right below the office of the quartermaster in charge of transportation. You will separate the office from the pier from which the ships leave.

Mr. WELCH of California. If there be no objection, may I insert this letter in the RECORD?

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1928.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR REED: Referring to S. 1665, a bill to authorize the construction of a recreation pier at the edge of Fort Mason, Calif., I take pleasure in informing you that the War Department will interpose no objection to the enactment of this measure.

The city of San Francisco, Calif., desires to construct a pier as an essential feature of an aquatic park, and the necessity for this legislation is due to the fact that this pier is planned to encroach slightly on the eastern edge of the Fort Mason Military Reservation. The construction of this pier will also require the removal of a Government pier. The land on which the pier stands is owned by the city, but in view of the easement held by the Government the city is willing to build a new pier in another location. In view of the meritorious nature of the project, the fact that the encroachment is slight and the advantage to the War Department of securing a new pier, I recommend the passage of the bill.

That is signed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand then that my amendment is agreeable to the gentleman; I will not object.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to grant a permit to the board of park commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, Calif., to construct, maintain, and use a recreation pier in connection with the establishment of an aquatic park at the foot of Van Ness Avenue, San Francisco, Calif., and for such purpose to encroach upon the lands belonging to the United States and comprising a part of the Fort Mason Military Reservation.

SEC. 2. The permit shall be conditioned upon the relocation on a suitable site of the present wharf of the Army Transport Service, in such manner as may be determined by the Secretary of War, and without inconvenience or delay to the Army Transport Service, and shall be subject to such other terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for the protection of the Fort Mason Military Reservation. The terms and conditions of such permit shall be performed without expense to the United States.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "service," insert "and prior to the use of the recreation pier by the city of San Francisco."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEVEL OF LAKE OF THE WOODS

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar 338, H. R. 10884.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 338. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10884) to amend the act entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the convention between the United States and Great Britain to regulate the level of Lake of the Woods concluded on the 24th day of February, 1925," approved May 22, 1926.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, was this bill objected to?

The SPEAKER. It was passed over without prejudice, and the gentleman from Minnesota now asks unanimous consent to return to it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the convention between the United States and Great Britain to regulate the level of Lake of the Woods concluded on the 24th day of February, 1925," approved May 22, 1926, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, as soon as practicable after the enactment of this act, by purchase or by condemnation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to authorize condemnation of land for sites for public buildings, and for other purposes,' approved August 1, 1888, and in accordance with the constitutional provisions of the State of Minnesota which provide that private property shall not be taken, destroyed, or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor first paid or secured, the flowage easements up to elevation 1,064 sea-level datum upon all lands in such State bordering on the Lake of the Woods, Warroad River, and Rainy River, and such lands or interests therein as are necessary to provide for the protective works and measures in such State along the shores of the Lake of the Woods and the banks of the Warroad River and the Rainy River as specified in article 8 of the convention signed at Washington on the 24th day of February, 1925, between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain providing for the regulation of the level of the Lake of the Woods."

SEC. 2. Section 1 of such act approved May 22, 1926, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows:

"In such condemnation proceedings fees and mileage of witnesses shall be assessed against the United States to the same extent in any given case as if the proceeding had been initiated by a private corporation."

SEC. 3. Section 3 of such act approved May 22, 1926, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like an opportunity to read the hearings on this before the bill is taken up for consideration. While the purpose of the bill is very desirable, the form of the bill impressed me as extremely ragged, and I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. THATCHER. I would like very much to have the bill passed.

Mr. CRAMTON. No one can tell from the bill itself what money is coming out of the Treasury, and under what terms it is coming out, or what is going to be done with it, or what safeguards are placed about it. I would like a chance to read up on the matter and find out. I have not yet been able to find out.

Mr. THATCHER. The United States Government has representation on the board which controls the laboratory work.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not sure that that is correct under the bill. I am not sure that the bill accomplishes what your report says.

Mr. THATCHER. It has been on the calendar three times now.

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall either make an objection or ask that it go over.

Mr. THATCHER. If the gentleman is going to insist, of course I want it to go over without prejudice.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. That will be done anyway.

With committee amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "monument" and insert in lieu thereof the words "tablet or marker," and in line 8, strike out the word "monument" and insert in lieu thereof the words "tablet or marker," and on line 3 of page 2, strike out $10,000" and insert "$2,500," and amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the erection at Clinton, Sampson County, N. C., of a tablet or marker in commemoration of William Rufus King, former Vice President of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the able and distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY] on the passage of the pending bill, which authorizes the erection at Clinton, Sampson County, N. C., of a monument in commemoration of William Rufus King, former Vice President of the United States. I rejoice with the gentleman that through his efforts a tablet to cost some $2,500 is to be erected by the Federal Government at the birthplace of the former Vice President to commemorate his long and great career of public service. I am always happy to see the Government take recognition of the services of one of her distinguished statesmen, but I am particularly happy to see this recognition by the Government of the services of Mr. King because it was as a citizen of Alabama, the State which I have the honor to represent, that Mr. King did his greatest and most notable work. Born in Sampson County, N. C., on April 7, 1786, Mr. King was chosen in 1810 at the early age of 24 years as a Member of the United States Congress from North Carolina. He served in this capacity for six years, during the administration of President Madison, when he accepted the position of secretary of legation to the American Embassy at St. Petersburg. After remaining abroad for two years, Mr. King returned to this country and decided to locate in the Territory of Alabama. He went to Alabama and took up his residence on a plantation in Dallas County. In 1819 he was elected as a delegate from that county to the convention which drafted the first constitution of the State, he being a member of the subcommittee which did the actual work of the drafting of the instrument. When the first general assembly of the State met, he was elected to the United States Senate, where he served from December 14, 1819, to April 15, 1844—a period of a quarter of a century. In 1844 he accepted the position of minister to France, a position of extraordinary importance at the time due to the very sensitive condition existing between this country and France on account of the proposed annexation of Texas. Having served with rare distinction for two years in France, Mr. King returned to the United States and was appointed by Governor Chapman to the seat in the United States Senate made vacant by the resignation of Hon. Arthur P. Bagby.

He was reelected to the Senate, serving from July 1, 1848, to January, 1853, when he resigned. The Senate reposed so much confidence in his judgment and ability as a presiding officer that he was elected several times as the President pro tempore of that body. In 1852 Mr. King was nominated for Vice President on the ticket with Franklin Pierce and was elected by a large majority. While serving in the Senate he contracted tuberculosis, and spent the winter of 1853 in Cuba in an effort to regain his health. By a special act of Congress he took the oath of office as Vice President of the United States in Habana, Cuba, on March 4, 1853. As there was no improvement in his health, he returned to Alabama, and died on the day after arriving at his home in Cahaba. During the long years that Mr. King served in the Congress he knew well and came in intimate contact with the other great giants of his day, notably, John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Stephen A. Douglas, Thomas H. Benton, Lewis Cass, and Edward Everett. At the time of his death memorial exercises were held in both Houses of Congress, and many just and eloquent tributes were paid him. Of him, Mr. Cass, of Michigan, said:

His career was eminently useful and fortunate; and in the whole range of American statesmen there are few, indeed, to whom our youth can better look, when seeking models of imitation and encouragement, than to William R. King.

Firm but courteous, frank and fearless, of high honor and irreproachable morals, he brought a vigorous intellect and varied and extensive information to the public councils, and the ripe fruit of his experience, joined to these endowments, gave conviction to his opinion and authority to his example. We always heard him with attention, for he elucidated every subject he investigated and brought to our discussions the stores of his knowledge and experience with a manner as unassuming as it was captivating. While loving the State in which he so long resided, and which had given him so many proofs of confidence and affection, he loved also our common country, and at home and abroad proved himself the true patriot, the able and faithful citizen. In all the relations of private life he was loved and honored, as well from the amenity of his manner as from the kindness of his heart, and in the social circle he was the very model of the accomplished gentleman. For almost half a century he was in the public service, and was intimately connected with many of the great events which marked that long and stirring period, and he proved himself equal to all the circumstances in which he was placed, sustaining himself with signal ability among men whose renown is written in imperishable characters upon the history of our country.

BATTLE FIELD OF KINGS MOUNTAIN, S. C.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11140 to provide for the inspection of the battle field of Kings Mountain, S. C.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think the bill ought to go over to-day. I think that before the House acts on that it ought to have a better idea as to how much of a proposition this may be. How many thousand acres of land may we have to buy?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I can give that information now. It would not be over 80 or 100 acres, if that many. This is not for the purpose of buying land.

Mr. CRAMTON. I know. I was judging by this little starter that has now come in here of $3,000 to authorize three men, who are residents, to make a survey of 80 acres. I would rather spend the $3,000 on the 80 acres.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the gentleman objects to the amount, we can reduce that to $1,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. With the understanding that this is probably more than you will need?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not object to that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there any movement to donate this land?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am going to try to find out.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then the passage of this bill would not be construed as committing Congress to buy that land?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No. I want to state that this bill passed in the Sixty-ninth Congress. You can make it $1,500 if that is what you want to do.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think $1,000 would be more than enough.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created, to be composed of the following members, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of War: (1) A commissioned officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army; (2) a citizen and resident of York County, State of South Carolina; (3) a citizen and resident of Cleveland County, State of North Carolina.

SEC. 2. In appointing the members of the commission created by section 1 of this act the Secretary of War shall, as far as practicable, select persons familiar with the terrain of the battle field of Kings Mountain, S. C., and the historical events associated therewith.

C., in order to ascertain the feasibility of preserving and marking for historical and professional military study such field. The commission shall submit a report of its findings and an itemized statement of its expenses to the Secretary of War not later than December 1, 1928.

SEC. 4. There is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, in order to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: On page 1, line 8, at the end of the line, strike out the period and insert the following: "(4) And a citizen of Cherokee County, S. C."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, carrying out the agreement made with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], I move to strike out the figures "$3,000" in line 14, on page 2, and insert the figures "$1,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection. This is a departmental bill. It has been the practice of the Interior Department for a number of years to incorporate into one bill a number of very meritorious cases that have been passed upon by the board of review in the Interior Department, cases that can not technically come within the precise provisions of the law. So they are sent up to the House and Senate committees and embodied in a bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think a bill of this nature, a validating bill, should be considered on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. Such bills have always been considered on the Consent Calendar ever since I have been in Congress. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall have to object until I have an opportunity to look over the committee report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

C., a flagstaff, with appropriate landscape and architectural setting, and to place in connection therewith a memorial commemorating the defense of the fort by Gen. Robert Anderson. Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, on page 2, line 8, of the resotion there is a typographical error. The name "Lawson" should be "Lawton."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the Senate bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause to be paid, from the whole sum appropriated for the support of the National Guard for the fiscal year 1928, a sum not to exceed $4,000, to pay officers of the Hawaiian National Guard and Filipinos who were formerly duly enlisted as members of the Hawaiian National Guard, for field and armory training during the years 1924 and 1925, and for which training they have not been paid because the enlisted Filipinos were not citizens of the United States, as required by sections 57 and 58 of the national defense act, as amended. All such payments heretofore made to officers and enlisted men of the Hawaiian National Guard are hereby validated.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to strike out certain language.

I may say the purpose of this amendment is simply to strike out the language which says this is to be paid out of a certain appropriation heretofore made. This constitutes an appropriation and puts a new burden upon the fund. I do not believe this is a good practice to follow. With this language eliminated, the payment is authorized and the question can be determined later as to the source of the payment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Beginning in line 3, page 1, after the word "to," strike out the remainder of line 3 and all of lines 4, 5, and 6, up to and including the word "to," so that the bill will read:

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I object.

AMENDING SECTION 80 OF THE JUDICIAL CODE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2752) to amend section 80 of the Judicial Code to create a new judicial district in Indiana, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, this will in no way cause the appointment of an additional judge?

Mr. DYER. No; we have two judges in that district now. This is to divide the State of Indiana into two districts.

Mr. CRAMTON. It does not involve the appointment of a new judge, but it does a new district attorney and a new marshal.

Mr. BLANTON. If that is the case, I will object.

Mr. DYER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. I am saving the gentleman from Michigan the trouble.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will take care of my own troubles.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Michigan furnished me with the information, and I object.

Mr. DYER. This only provides that the State of Indiana, which is now one district, shall be divided into two districts. It has two judges. It is for the convenience of the people who have business in court and the one district attorney can not attend to the whole State.

Mr. BLANTON. We will have another call of the Consent Calendar before long.

Mr. HICKEY. Let me say that there are seven divisions in the State of Indiana with one district attorney and two judges. In the administration of justice the courts have found that it would be far better to have two districts.

Mr. BLANTON. The district attorney has an assistant in each division.

Mr. HICKEY. Yes; but there is important litigation coming up, and the defense are usually extremely well represented.

Mr. BLANTON. The two judges do not hold criminal business all the time. Much of their time is taken up in civil business.

Mr. HICKEY. There are seven divisions and only one district attorney, and he can not be in attendance at all of the courts.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to look into it further, and for the present I object.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE OF SECOND JUDICIAL CIRCUIT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11139) for the appointment of an additional circuit judge of the second judicial circuit.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT CARONDELET, ST. LOUIS COUNTY, MO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10145) authorizing the American Bridge & Ferry Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Carondelet, St. Louis County, Mo.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I object.

NAVAL ORDNANCE PLANT, SOUTH CHARLESTON, W. VA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 160) requesting certain information relative to the United States naval ordnance plant, South Charleston, W. Va.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, required to furnish to the Congress of the United States as soon as practicable the following information relative to the United States naval ordnance plant located at South Charleston, W. Va.:

First. The actual cost of the plant;

Second. The annual cost of maintenance, including number of officers and men employed;

Third. The amount and cost of armor plate purchased annually by the Government, and whether or not same can be purchased in open market cheaper than manufactured at said plant;

Fourth. The advisability of opening and operating said plant within the near future; or, the selling or leasing thereof to some manufacturing concern so that a fair return may be realized on the investment;

Fifth. Any other information that would tend to shed light on the operation, sale, or leasing of said plant.

With the following amendment:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the word "plant" and the period and insert the word "plant" and a semicolon, and add the following:

"Sixth. Information relating to the advisability of selling, leasing, or operating the projectile plant located at South Charleston, W. Va."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask some one interested in this bill a question. How does it happen to be a joint resolution?

Mr. ENGLAND. I figured that it had to be passed by both branches of Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This merely asks for a report from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. ENGLAND. That is true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is very unusual for an inquiry to be made by way of a joint resolution. A joint resolution has to be signed by the President of the United States. The usual form is a simple resolution by one body or the other making the request.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman is correct, because we do not have to get permission from the Senate to get facts from any department.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And in this case it goes still further. It will have to be signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. ENGLAND. I would have no objection to an amendment changing the joint resolution to a House resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this House Joint Resolution 160 be changed to a simple House resolution and given its appropriate number by the Journal clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLAND. And, Mr. Speaker, where it requires in the joint resolution that the information be furnished Congress, I ask that it be so changed that the information will be furnished the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so amended.

There was no objection.

PROMOTING EXPORT TRADE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8927) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes," approved April 10, 1918.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SOUTH DAKOTA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8551) to create an additional judge in the district of South Dakota.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold this for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but I intend to object.

Mr. DYER. This does not create an additional judge. There is one judge in this district. He is incapacitated and will be eligible for retirement within a few months.

Mr. BLANTON. And as soon as he is retired the President of the United States will appoint some one to succeed him.

Mr. DYER. He can not under this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean without this bill.

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. So that after we pass this bill and this distinguished judge retires and the President appoints a successor, we will have two judges instead of one.

Mr. DYER. This bill provides that no successor shall be appointed. This creates only one judge. It is to relieve a situation for a few months only. The present incumbent can not retire because he has yet a few months to serve.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, NINTH CIRCUIT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8295) for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the ninth judicial district.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I intend ultimately to object. But if the gentleman wants to make a statement, I will withhold.

Mr. LEAVITT. Possibly the gentleman, in objecting, thinks this is to create a new position. That is not the case. This is simply to authorize the appointment of a judge in lieu of the judge already retired. It adds nothing to the expense and carries forward the business. This is practically coextensive with the largest zone we talked about the other day in the discussion of the radio bill.

Mr. BLANTON. This is a circuit judge?

Mr. LEAVITT. Only two judges serve there. One is 65 and one is 81 years old.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we have just had the Senate confirm one of our colleagues, one of the most active men in this House, and he is about 70. I shall object for the present.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. As I understand the situation, Judge Hunt, who is retired, was to be the judge of the commerce court, which has been legislated out of existence by the Congress, and he has been transferred to this circuit. No successor is to be appointed to succeed him. It is a very large circuit, having an immense amount of work. There are only two judges. They need this judge very badly. I trust the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. For the present I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The bill will be passed over without prejudice. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LASSEN VOLCANIC NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11023) to add certain lands to the Lassen Volcanic National Park in the Sierra Nevada Mountains of the State of California.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the lands hereafter described, to wit: The southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, section 25, and the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section 26, township 29 north, range 3 east, Mount Diablo meridian, in the State of California, are hereby added to and made a part of the Lassen Volcanic National Park for use as an administrative headquarters site.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act of August 9, 1916, entitled "An act to establish the Lassen Volcanic National Park in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in the State of California, and for other purposes," the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes," and all acts supplementary to and amendatory of said acts are made applicable to and extended over the lands hereby added to the park: Provided, That the provisions of the act of June 10, 1920, entitled "An act to create a Federal Power Commission, to provide for the improvement of navigation, the development of water power, the use of the public lands in relation thereto, and to repeal section 18 of the rivers and harbors appropriation act, approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes," shall not apply to or extend over such lands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

DISBURSEMENT OF FEDERAL FUNDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5772) to regulate, control, and safeguard the disbursement of Federal funds expended for the creation, construction, extension, repair, or ornamentation of any public building, highway, levee, dam, excavation, dredging, drainage, or other construction project, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FILING BONDS, TERRITORY OF ALASKA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 328) to relieve the Territory of Alaska from the necessity of filing bonds or security in legal proceedings in which such Territory is interested.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all actions or proceedings in any court in which the Territory of Alaska is a party, or in which it is interested, it shall not be required to furnish any bond or undertaking upon appeal or otherwise in any such action or proceeding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

INTERNATIONAL EMIGRATION AND IMMIGRATION CONFERENCE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10167) to authorize the President to accept the invitation of the Cuban Government to appoint delegates to the Second International Emigration and Immigration Conference to be held at Habana, commencing March 31, 1928.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this resolution authorizes the President to accept an invitation and appoint delegates to some sort of an international conference to discuss the question of immigration. The question of immigration is one that we have always treated as a domestic question. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

DOUBLE PENSIONS IN CASES OF AIRCRAFT ACCIDENT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10479) granting double pensions to dependents under existing pension laws in all cases where an officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man or student flyer of the United States Army dies or is disabled due to aircraft accident.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this seems to be special legislation. I would like to know how a man would be any more dead if he were kicked by a mule or fell out of an airplane. As I understand, those engaged in the aviation service are already on additional pay, and if the pension to our enlisted men in the Army is not sufficient, I believe that ought to be raised. We ought not to take three or four or five bites to the cherry and make a special class from time to time.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Is not the chance of being dead in aviation double the chance in any other branch of the service?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It does not make any difference. They are all in the same service. It makes no difference whether a man dies from the kick of a mule or the crash of an airplane or by collision with a seaplane or a submarine.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to treat all widows on the same plane? He wants to treat them all alike?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Why, certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. A dead husband is worth just as much to his widow as any other dead husband is to his widow.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Certainly. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 325) repealing existing law requiring the Postmaster General to report action taken on claims of postmasters.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have objected to this bill heretofore; but our distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. SPROUL] is very insistent on passing this bill, and he thinks it is not too great a departure from our present laws to let this act be repealed. He thinks it will not be hurtful; I bow to his judgment, and I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the "act to amend the act approved May 9, 1888, as amended by the act of June 11, 1896," approved January 21, 1914, which requires the Postmaster General to make an annual report to Congress of his action on claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty, is hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESERVE SUPPLIES HELD BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7752) to limit the issue of reserve supplies or equipment held by the War Department.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. He not being present, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8567) to amend section 29 of the act of March 29, 1916, entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," and for the insertion of a new section in said act between sections 29 and 30 of said act, to be designated as "Section 29½" of said act.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is not a more controversial measure before Congress. After much controversy in the committee, the committee finally voted it out by 8 to 7. I reserved the right to object merely to congratulate the chairman upon his wonderful optimism in putting it on this calendar. I object.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT SEVILLE, SPAIN

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 211) to amend Public Resolution No. 65, approved March 3, 1925, authorizing the participation of the United States Government in the international exposition to be held in Seville, Spain.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but I intend to object.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that the bill does not involve an additional cent of expenditure. It is very necessary to carry on the construction of the building that is in process of construction at Seville under appropriations heretofore made if it is to be ready for the exposition in October. The bill is only intended to allow the Secretary of State to certify the vouchers and the estimates for expenditure instead of requiring the architect to do it at Seville, Spain, the architect finding it impossible to remain there all the time.

Mr. BLANTON. I have a report on this bill that is not exactly in accord with the gentleman's idea of it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has the gentleman read the report of the hearings?

Mr. BLANTON. I say, I have a special report on it.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to know from what source that report comes. I think it is very important that this bill pass.

Mr. BLANTON. The report I have is that it will cost the Government some money and that there will be some one sent there.

Mr. BURTON. Not necessarily.

Mr. BLANTON. Not necessarily, but we may expect it.

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As a matter of fact, the assistant architect is on the ground, but it is impossible for the architect to remain there all the time.

Mr. BLANTON. This meeting to-day came up prematurely. We did not know it was coming up, and I want a chance to look over the report I have in my office.

Mr. BURTON. I hope the gentleman will examine that report speedily.

Mr. BLANTON. I will by the time of the next meeting and, of course, if I find that my friend from Virginia, who is usually correct on his facts, is correct in this instance and that the information I have is not correct, then I shall not interpose an objection. However, if my report is correct, it does involve an expenditure for sending a man over there to Spain on a junket trip.

Mr. BURTON. No; the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for the present, I object.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE DELAWARE RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2800) authorizing E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River at or near Burlington, N. J.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to obtain some information as to whether or not the municipal governments can not construct this bridge?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I live in the district in which the approach of one end of the bridge will be constructed. I introduced a bill at the commencement of the session authorizing a bridge to be built from Burlington to Bristol.

This bill passed the Senate and has been signed by the President. There was a gentleman's agreement that I would not object to this bill, provided there would be no objections to the bridge bill I introduced. It has been the policy of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee to grant two or more bridges at the same locality, perhaps within a mile or so of each other, therefore the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee granted its consent to this bridge. Both bridges have had the approval of the War Department, and I hope in accordance with my statement the gentleman will not object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Delaware River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Burlington, N. J., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of New Jersey, the State of Pennsylvania, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interest in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 30 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War and with the highway departments of the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "successors and assigns or his or their"; and in line 6, strike out the parenthesis after the word "assigns"; page 2, line 7, strike out the words "successors and assigns or his or their"; page 2, line 8, after the word "assigns," strike out the parenthesis; page 2, line 20, strike out the words "successors and assigns or his or their"; and in line 22, page 2, after the word "assigns," strike out the parenthesis; page 4, line 1, after the word "shall," insert the words "at any time"; page 4, line 11, strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty"; page 4, line 24, strike out the words "successors and assigns or his or their"; and in line 25, after the word "assigns," strike out the parenthesis; page 5, line 16, strike out the word "successors and assigns or his or their"; and on page 5, line 17, strike out the parenthesis after the word "assigns"; page 5, line 17, strike out the word "its" and insert the word "his" in lieu thereof; page 6, line 1, strike out the words "successors and assigns or his or their"; page 6, line 2, after the word "assigns," strike out the parenthesis.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

HOSPITAL AT MUSKOGEE, OKLA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4964) to authorize the city of Muskogee, Okla., to remove and retain title to the boilers from the Municipal Hospital Building recently conveyed by the city to the United States Veterans' Bureau Hospital No. 90 at Muskogee, Okla.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Muskogee, Okla., through its authorized representatives be, and it is hereby, authorized to remove from the Municipal Hospital Building, recently sold by said city to the United States Veterans' Bureau Hospital No. 90, at Muskogee, Okla., and retain title to the boilers in said Municipal Hospital Building, having been reserved when the sale of said hospital building was consummated, but which reservation was erroneously omitted from the deed conveying said Municipal Hospital Building from said city to the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 90.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OHIO & ERIE CANAL

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11200) donating to the Ohio State Archæological and Historical Society two dedication stones formerly a part of one of the locks of the Ohio & Erie Canal.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am wondering how the Federal Government happens to have title to these dedication stones. Did the Federal Government construct this canal?

Mr. LUCE. Just how they came into the ownership of the Government I do not know.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The canal is not now of use?

Mr. LUCE. No.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. These stones are of no value.

Mr. LUCE. They are of no value to anyone at all. They would have to be broken up and used for walls or something of that sort.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was just wondering, if they are of no value, why Ohio wanted them. Usually Ohio wants something of value. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate bill (S. 3292) will be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to turn over to the Ohio State Archæological and Historical Society for preservation in the museum of said society the two dedication stones formerly a part of one of the locks of the Ohio & Erie Canal, and now located on the reservation of the United States Industrial Reformatory at Chillicothe, Ohio.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

LOUISVILLE BRIDGE BILL

Mr. THATCHER. I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on H. R. 9660, to construct a bridge across the Ohio River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, consent is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, there has been enacted into law at this session of Congress the bill H. R. 9660, which I had the honor to introduce and press for enactment. It authorizes the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge across the Ohio River at or near that city. The act is in the newer form being used by Congress in bridge bills, subject to certain modifications suited to the local situation involved. The act was approved February 25, 1928 (Public, No. 73, 70th Cong.), and is as follows:

[Public No. 73, Seventieth Congress]

An act (H. R. 9660) authorizing the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near said city

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes the city of Louisville, Ky., or any board or commission of said city which may be duly created or established for the purpose, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Ohio River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, extending from some point in the city of Louisville, Ky., across said river to a point opposite on the Indiana shore, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the said city of Louisville, or such board or commission and the successors thereof, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, maintenance, and operation of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge puposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said city of Louisville, or such board or commission and the successors thereof, are hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of tolls so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of such bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interests and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of tolls shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Approved, February 25, 1928.

The history of the legislation in regard to this projected bridge is very interesting. In the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress, at the instance of the city of Louisville, I introduced a bill (H. R. 9599) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Louisville, or to any duly created board or commission to construct, maintain, and operate a highway or combined highway and railroad bridge across the Ohio River at Louisville. This measure passed the two Houses and was approved April 2, 1926 (Public, No. 88, 69th Cong.). It authorized the imposition of tolls for a period not to exceed 30 years in order to defray the—cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches, to pay an adequate return on the investment, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of the bridge and approaches within a period of not to exceed 30 years from the completion thereof.

It further provided that after a sinking fund sufficient to pay the cost of construction should be provided, the bridge should be maintained and operated free of tolls, or that the rates of toll should be so adjusted as to provide a fund not exceeding the amount necessary for the proper care, maintenance, and operation of the bridge and its approaches. About the time of the enactment of this last-named measure the General Assembly of Kentucky passed an act enabling the city through itself, or a commission, or board to do the things necessary under State authority in and about the construction, operation, and maintenance of the proposed bridge.

At the regular November election of 1926 there was formally submitted to a vote of the citizens of Louisville a proposal for a city bond issue of $5,000,000 for the purpose of constructing this bridge, the bridge to be operated free of tolls. The proposal failed, as it did not receive the necessary two-thirds of those voting, as required by the Kentucky constitution.

Since, under the act of March 23, 1906—the basic act of Congress relating to the construction and operating of bridges—it is necessary to begin the construction of a bridge within one year from the date of approval of the enabling act involved; and since the city of Louisville was without the needed funds for this enterprise, no construction was undertaken before April 2, 1927, the date on which the original 1-year period expired. The city, however, desiring to submit to the voters at the November election, 1927, the proposal for a $5,000,000 bond issue based upon the collection of tolls for the payment of construction costs, there was secured during the second session of the Sixty-ninth Congress, the enactment of a bill (H. R. 5083), approved March 3, 1927 (Public Law, No. 745, 69th Cong. 2d sess.). This act authorized the extension of the date of beginning construction of the bridge one year from the original date April 2, 1926; that is to say, until April 2, 1927; and it also authorized the extension of the date of the completion of the bridge three years; that is to say, until April 2, 1930. Thereupon, at the November election, 1927, the citizens of Louisville voted a second time on the proposed $5,000,000 bond issue, the bond proposal at that election, however, being based on a proposed collection of tolls sufficient to pay the cost of construction of the bridge during the period, not to exceed 30 years, as named in the original act. This bond issue proposal also failed because it did not receive the necessary two-thirds vote of those voting on the question.

Under the constitution and laws of Kentucky the city of Louisville, being a city of the first class, can not issue bonds based upon the faith and credit of the city unless such issuance is authorized by the vote of the people in the manner already indicated. After the failure of this last bond issue proposal the mayor of Louisville and a bridge committee, appointed by him, entered into negotiations with various banking institutions with the view of arranging for the construction of the proposed bridge, under the city's supervision, through funds derived from loans to be secured by the tolls of the bridge, when constructed until the loans were repaid; the bonds of the city to be issued in favor of such loaning institution with the tolls thus pledged for the payment of such bonds, but without the other resources or the credit of the city pledged therefor.

This arrangement protected by another enabling act of the Kentucky legislature, 1928 session, has been made without the necessity of a bond-issue approval by the voters of the city, since the city's general credit and resources are not involved.

These negotiations have been consummated, and a banking firm has entered into a contract with the city of Louisville to furnish the necessary funds for the construction of the proposed bridge, and will accept as security for the loan, bonds issued in the indicated manner. Plans have been completed for the construction of the bridge which is to extend from Second Street, on the Louisville shore, to Jeffersonville, on the Indiana shore. These plans have been approved by the Secretary of War, and it is expected that the work will shortly begin.

The act approved February 25, 1928, already quoted, was enacted in order to confer upon the city anew the right to construct, maintain, and operate this bridge and in order, also, to permit the financing of such construction in the manner already indicated.

Mr. T. H. MacDonald, chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture, states that this last named bill is the most important measure dealing with the question of toll bridge construction enacted at this session of Congress. This is for the reason that under its provisions financing of bridge enterprises may be arranged for by cities and municipalities through the pledge of operating tolls within the time limit fixed by Congress, and subject to the regulatory power over tolls conferred on the Secretary of War by the Federal bridge act of 1906. This Louisville bridge act, therefore, may be considered as constituting pioneer legislation on the subject; and it is believed that its effect will be most far-reaching. The present policy of Congress undoubtedly favors, wherever possible, the construction and operation of highway bridges by States and municipalities, and their agencies, with the idea that they shall ultimately become free of tolls; or, at least, restricted to such tolls as may be necessary to maintain and operate any such bridge after the cost of construction is met. The act under discussion makes provision for these features.

Louisville is the metropolis, not only of Kentucky, but also of a considerable region beyond State lines as, for instance, the southern portion of Indiana. This bridge will constitute a link in a great highway system north and south, and will promote and facilitate interstate commerce in a most effective way. The Louisville Hydroelectric Co. has recently constructed a great power plant at Louisville and is now utilizing the water power of the Ohio River Falls there for hydroelectric purposes. This plant is one of the largest of the kind in the entire country, and its operation, because of the cheapness of power which will result therefrom, will undoubtedly attract to Louisville, as well as to the other falls cities of New Albany and Jeffersonville, Ind., on the north shore of the Ohio River, opposite Louisville, factories, and business enterprises of all descriptions. The new bridge will fit into the scheme of development going on in these cities, and it is believed that under the act of authorization the cost of the construction of the bridge will be met through reasonable tolls charged well within the time limit of 20 years named in the act, and thereupon the bridge will be operated free of all tolls except such as may be necessary for operation and maintenance purposes.

PACIFIC SOUTHWEST EXPOSITION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 126) providing for the cooperation of the United States in the Pacific Southwest Exposition in commemoration of the landing of the Spanish padres in the Pacific Southwest and the opening of the Long Beach, Calif., world port.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say that this bill imposes no expense whatever on the Government. It is in the usual form and in a complete committee amendment for the original bill provides, first, that articles brought in from a foreign country for the sole purpose of exhibition may be admitted free of duty, but if sold duty shall be paid; secondly, that the departments of the Government may be permitted to send exhibits on request, without any expense to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that there have been articles brought into the United States for exhibition reputed to be of tremendous value, but because proof could not be had that they had not been sold, no duty was paid on them?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That would have nothing to do with this, because these goods are to be brought in under the supervision of the Treasury Department, the Customs Bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. For the present I am going to object.

ABOLISHING DISBURSING OFFICER, LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10544) to abolish the office of administrative assistant and disbursing officer in the Library of Congress and to reassign the duties thereof.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the office of administrative assistant and disbursing officer of the Library of Congress, created by act of Congress approved June 29, 1922, is abolished on and after this date. Thereafter the duties required to be performed by the administrative assistant and disbursing officer shall be performed, under the direction of the Librarian of Congress, by such persons as the Librarian may appoint for those purposes: Provided, That the person who shall disburse the appropriations for the Library of Congress and the Botanic Garden shall give bond payable to the United States in the sum of $30,000, with sureties approved by the Secretary of the Treasury for the faithful discharge of his duties.

With the following committee amendments, which were read:

After the enacting clause insert the following: "From and after June 10, 1928."

Strike out the word "that" in line 1, and in line 5 the words "on" and "after this date."

Line 6, strike out "Thereafter" and insert "thereafter."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, in the report accompanying this bill there is an error that I wish to correct, that it may do no harm to the present incumbent of the position. The report says that she requests involuntary retirement. It should read that she expects involuntary retirement. If left to read as it is, it might interfere with her retirement.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL PAY FOR PERSONNEL ON SUBMARINE VESSELS AND DIVING DUTY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9289) to provide additional pay for the personnel of the United States Navy assigned to duty on submarine vessels and diving duty.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that some of the gentlemen who study and follow these bills most closely are not prepared to-day to go much farther on this calendar, and would be more or less in the dark if we proceeded further. Therefore I suggest that we stop here.

Mr. BLANTON. Why not move that we adjourn?

Mr. TILSON. As soon as we clear up the business now pending.

Mr. BLANTON. We have finished what we started on. We have finished the bill.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. VESTAL. To speak about this Consent Calendar. There are probably a few bills yet undisposed of to which there would be no objection. I have a very important bill that ought to be disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. TILSON. What is the nature of it?

Mr. VESTAL. It is a bill to permit the officers in the Army and Navy and Government departments to make applications for patents without any cost to them where the head of the department makes a certificate that the patent will be used by the Government, and that it is for the use of the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. That bill would probably be objected to if it were reached.

Mr. VESTAL. I can not see why that sort of a bill should be objectionable.

Mr. BLANTON. They ought to have no more privilege than any other citizen of the United States.

Mr. VESTAL. They are not getting more privileges than other citizens.

Mr. BLANTON. They are to get their patents without cost?

Mr. VESTAL. That is because they are to be used by the Government and they will get no royalty.

Mr. TILSON. I am informed that this bill has not been on the calendar long enough to be reached on the call to-day.

Mr. HOOPER. And we will go on with this calendar next Monday?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, certainly. The calendar will be called from the beginning next Monday. It was the hope that we might go far enough to-day, so that we might be able to complete the calendar next Monday.

VALIDATING CERTAIN ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (H. R. 11020) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and to consider the same at this time. The gentleman who objected to the bill before is ready now to withdraw his objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the bill. Since that time I have carefully studied the report, and I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, this is a long bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the reading of it be omitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

RESIGNATION OF TARIFF COMMISSIONER COSTIGAN

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have received a letter from Mr. Edward P. Costigan, who for many years has served as a member of the United States Tariff Commission. He has announced his retirement from the commission, and in the letter to which I refer has given his reasons for resigning and has discussed the work and proceedings of the commission, some proposals for reform, and the work of the tariff investigating committee of which the senior Senator from Arkansas is chairman. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD and referred to the Select Committee on Investigation of the Tariff Commission.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Select Committee on Investigation of the Tariff Commission and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESIGNATION FROM THE TARIFF COMMISSION

(Letter to Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON of Arkansas, chairman of the Senate investigating committee, from Edward P. Costigan, member of the United States Tariff Commission)

DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: As chairman of the Senate committee which was appointed two years ago this week to investigate the Tariff Commission, it is doubtless suitable that I send you a final letter on certain developments closely related to the underlying causes of that investigation. After more than 10 years of official service—exceeding by 4 years the membership of the nearest in time of my associates—I am about to transmit to the President of the United States my immediately effective, long-considered, and voluntary resignation as tariff commissioner. Listed for the most part in the order in which they have materialized, the chief reasons for my action are the following:

A SCIENTIFIC COMMISSION FOR IMPARTIAL TARIFF INVESTIGATIONS

The Tariff Commission—of whose originally appointed members I am and have long been the only official survivor—was designed to be, and for the first five years of its existence was, a scientific, nonpolitical, and impartial investigational agency of the Government. The law creating it planned a commission judicially independent of both the President and Congress, and free alike from official and private pressure in the discharge of its duties. The evidence is conclusive that the leading business interests of the United States, and public opinion generally, fully indorsed the original purposes of the statute.

FLEXIBLE TARIFF POWERS AND PLEDGES

The importance of a scientific commission was given added signal emphasis by the new powers conferred in the flexible provisions of the tariff act of 1922. Under section 315 of that act the commission is authorized to recommend for presidential proclamation, as the facts warrant, decreases or increases, in existing tariff rates, to equalize, within defined limits, differences in costs of production and other competitive conditions here and abroad. Pending the adoption of that section of the Fordney-McCumber tariff law, authorized spokesmen for the administration assured the public that, because of conditions following the World War, the tariff rates enacted by Congress in 1922, and thus declared subject to change down or up, had been purposely placed by Congress sufficiently high to permit in most cases tariff reductions in accordance with the standard laid down by Congress in the flexible provisions. For example, many more reductions than increases in tariff rates under the flexible provisions were publicly predicted by Senator SMOOT; and Senator McCumber confidently stated that the startlingly high ad valorem rates made possible by substituting American for foreign valuation—which the law permitted under certain circumstances—would probably never be employed by the President, except in a few cases like chemicals and toys. To crown those prophecies, President Harding in 1922 used the then existing prestige of the Tariff Commission to strengthen his assurance that there would be "a scientific and wholly just administration of the law." And President Coolidge in 1924 publicly pledged himself to administer the same law "not politically, but judicially."

UNIMPORTANT DECREASES, IMPORTANT INCREASES, AND NONACTION BY THE PRESIDENT

How have these rate-changing promises been fulfilled? At the end of five years, and at the cost of approximately $3,000,000, the Tariff Commission has made 32 reports to the President under the flexible tariff provisions. Those reports have grown out of investigations, not freely chosen by the commission, but instead requested by the President or the Senate, or, under a practice settled by President Harding, urged by private interests. The reports have resulted in 23 presidential proclamations, changing tariff rates. In 5 cases of little tariff importance—mill feed, bob-white quail, paintbrush handles, phenol, and cresylic acid—previous tariff rates have been reduced. In 18 cases, some of which related to articles of much tariff significance, the President has proclaimed substantial or maximum increases; and various other important cases are pending in which demands for maximum increases are being pressed by strongly intrenched industrial groups. In 2 dubious instances—taximeters and "hit-and-miss" rag rugs—by resorting to American valuation, President Coolidge has increased the former tariff rates of $3 plus 45 per cent per meter, and 35 per cent, respectively, on their foreign value, to rates, when the changes were made, approximating 100 per cent or more of such foreign value—such new rates being destined to go still higher when American selling prices advance.

NONACTION BY PRESIDENT—SUGAR, LINSEED OIL, AND HALIBUT

Even more significant for the consuming public are some of the cases in which the President has declined to act on decisive evidence that the rates should be substantially lowered—sugar, linseed oil, and halibut—to which, if Chairman Marvin and two other members of the commission have their way, will now be added the five-year-old investigation of logs of fir, spruce, cedar, and western hemlock.

The sugar report of 1924 recommended to the President considerably less than a 50 per cent decrease in the sugar tariff. In amount, the reduction thus held warranted under the law was about half a cent per pound; namely, an effective tariff on sugar of 1.23 cents per pound instead of the present duty of 1.76 cents per pound. That reduction, if then made, would have saved tax-paying consumers of the United States some $40,000,000 or more a year, while protecting the American sugar industry under the statutory rule indorsed by a Republican Congress and by President Harding.

The linseed oil report was sent to the President on March 3, 1925, more than three years ago. The result was a request from the President on February 6, 1926, for a fuller investigation. Yet the records in that investigation were so unescapable that even the usually immovable protectionist members of the commission, in the only important instance in the commission's experience, admitted the necessity under the law for a definite reduction in the duty. In that case the prices paid flax growers in this country were fully protected in the commission's recommendations through a proper allowance to crushers of linseed oil of full compensation for the tariff on flaxseed. In addition, the commission's recommendations paved the way to properly lowered prices on paints, especially important to American farmers, by reducing the excessive subsidies then and continuously since enjoyed under the tariff by linseed oil crushers.

CHANGES IN COMMISSION UNDER PRESIDENT HARDING

To understand such results certain factors in the situation must be recalled. Unfortunately the tariff revision out of which the flexible provisions grew, and the early exercise of the commission's new powers under those provisions, were accompanied by substantial changes, alike in presidential policy and in the standards and quality of the commission's membership. Such changes began under President Harding and, with two exceptions, have continued under President Coolidge. That they finally destroyed the commission's reputation for impartiality no candid and informed person will deny.

President Harding's contributions to the commission's membership by appointment were: First, Commissioner Marvin, former secretary of the Home Market Club of Boston, a tireless and fanatical protectionist, known in Washington as a tariff lobbyist for New England protected interests; second, former Commissioner Burgess, long similarly known in Congress for tariff-lobbying activities, especially on behalf of the domestic pottery industry; and, third, former Commissioner Glassie, a member of the bar of the District of Columbia, chosen as a Democrat, but extraordinarily fertile in advancing fallacious excuses for exceedingly high protective tariff rates, whose appointment was hailed as acceptable to the sugar interests of Louisiana. These three appointees of President Harding, and three of the commission's original members—Commissioners Lewis, Culbertson, and myself, selected as Democrat, Republican, and Progressive, respectively—made up the full membership of the commission when the administration of the flexible tariff began in the early months of 1923.

OFFICIAL AND UNOFFICIAL PRESSURE IN THE SUGAR INVESTIGATION

The consequences of the specified changes in personnel speedily became evident. Both from within and without pressure was brought on members of the commission, directed toward the destruction of the commission's impartiality. The indefensible methods employed are well illustrated by the course of the commission's sugar investigation, which was instituted in 1923 and completed in 1924. The sworn evidence taken by the Senate investigating committee records, in part, the following events in the progress of that investigation:

(1) President Harding's three appointees—Commissioners Marvin, Burgess, and Glassie, with Commissioner Glassie voting on the question—insisted on Commissioner Glassie's right to take part in the sugar investigation, in the outcome of which it was disclosed Commissioner Glassie's immediate family had a special, direct, substantial, and financial interest.

(2) In December, 1923, President Coolidge, who was empowered by the flexible provisions, was officially requested by me on legal and moral grounds to check Commissioner Glassie's asserted right to take part and vote in the sugar investigation. Instead, President Coolidge supported Commissioner Glassie's position with the weight of his powerful office, and Commissioner Glassie, though in January, 1924, his participation was publicly challenged by me, with the concurrence of Commissioners Lewis and Culbertson, continued to act in that investigation until Congress, in the spring of that year, by a special enactment, effectively rebuked him and his commission supporters—Commissioners Marvin and Burgess—and terminated the practice.

(3) While this significant issue over Commissioner Glassie hung in the balance, before it became public and prior to the action of Congress, Commissioner Culbertson reported that he had been offered and had refused membership in the Federal Trade Commission. Had Commissioner Culbertson been shifted to the Federal Trade Commission at that time, a majority of the remaining Tariff Commission would have supported Commissioner Glassie's breach of the requirements of impartiality and would have dictated the subsequent course of the sugar investigation.

(4) Following two public hearings, oral arguments, and the filing of briefs in the sugar investigation by attorneys for the domestic and Cuban interests, and after the case had been taken under advisement by the commission for the preparation of our official report to the President, Senator SMOOT—a recognized spokesman in Congress both for the administration and the domestic sugar interests—privately invited Commissioner Culbertson to a one-sided conference in the Senate Office Building, attended by representatives of the domestic sugar interests, including attorneys who had appeared before the commission. At that conference, without opportunity given other interested parties to be present, efforts were made to impress Commissioner Culbertson with the soundness of the arguments which the domestic sugar interests had advanced in the sugar investigation then being considered for decision by all members of the commission.

(5) When it became apparent, notwithstanding these incidents and the dilatory tactics of Commissioners Marvin and Burgess (Commissioner Glassie no longer being free to participate), that the sugar report was to be given precedence for the President's consideration, a request was received by the Tariff Commission from the President to the effect that the commission suspend all other work, take up the butter investigation, and proceed with that until its completion.

(6) About the same time a disappointed tariff applicant lodged an attack with President Coolidge on Commissioner Culbertson's right to continue as a member of the Tariff Commission. The charge was that Commissioner Culbertson had violated the law creating the Tariff Commission by delivering paid lectures at Georgetown University in Washington and at Williamstown, Mass., since the law provides that no tariff commissioner shall engage in any other activity or employment. The President, in effect, requested the Attorney General to advise him whether, as urged, Commissioner Culbertson had been guilty of malfeasance in office, making him subject to removal by the President, for delivering such lectures.

(7) During the very days when these grave charges were being considered by the Attorney General, Commissioner Culbertson—who has since been appointed by President Coolidge and now is United States minister to Rumania—reported that assurances were being given him at the White House by the President's Secretary that Commissioner Culbertson was being considered for various conspicuous positions in the United States Diplomatic Service. Shortly after, and just before the commission planned to send its final recommendations in the sugar case to the President, Commissioner Culbertson further reported that President Coolidge had conferred with him about an opinion from the Attorney General upholding the President's right to remove Commissioner Culbertson from office on the basis of the specified charges. Commissioner Culbertson added that in that conference President Coolidge, with the unfavorable opinion of the Attorney General before him, requested Commissioner Culbertson to delay sending the sugar report to the President.

(8) In spite of these and other obstacles, on July 31, 1924, the commission's sugar report was sent to the White House. Some five weeks later, on September 8, President Coolidge had before him the question whether he would reappoint Commissioner Lewis, who had joined in the preparation of the majority opinion. Earlier in the year word was sent Commissioner Lewis from the White House that, with the expiration of Commissioner Lewis's term on September 8, the President expected to reappoint him, in keeping with the nonpolitical character of the commission. As the date, however, of possible reappointment approached, contrary rumors were circulated. A so-called National Tariff Council, with headquarters in Denver, circularized about 100 leading business men, requesting contributions of $100 each—a total of $10,000—in part for the declared purpose of securing the appointment of "a protectionist Democrat" as the successor of Commissioner Lewis. A few days before Commissioner Lewis's term expired the letter thus sent out received unexpected publicity.

(9) On September 8, 1924, in the midst of President Coolidge's campaign for election, Commissioner Lewis was asked to call at the White House with reference to his reappointment. With the invitation came the statement that, if reappointed, Commissioner Lewis was expected by President Coolidge to leave at the White House a blanket letter of resignation from the commission for use at any time by the President. In fact, Commissioner Lewis was handed the form of resignation President Coolidge himself was said to have dictated for Commisisoner Lewis's signature.

Commissioner Lewis's sworn and uncontradicted testimony is that, during his visit that afternoon with President Coolidge, the President asked whether Commissioner Lewis had brought his resignation. Commissioner Lewis, whose official attitude was always unflinchingly frank and disinterested, replied in the negative. He further told the President, in substance, that the latter was free to destroy the appointment credentials he had started to sign. The President, however, insisted on delivering to Commissioner Lewis a temporary appointment, good only until March 4, 1925, the end of the approaching session of Congress. When so doing the President advised Commissioner Lewis that the latter would hold office in any event only at his (the President's) pleasure.

It may be added (though not in the published testimony) that on leaving the White House on September 8, 1924, Commissioner Lewis said to a friend: "I have been in public life 25 years. Once only in that time have I been approached with a view to my weakness, and that was by a President of the United States."

(10) On March 4, 1925, President Coolidge allowed Commissioner Lewis's temporary appointment to expire without reappointment or further notice. Thereafter Commissioner Dennis, a protectionist Democrat and long-time acquaintance and friend of the President, was named to succeed Commissioner Lewis. Some two months later, on May 17, President Coolidge appointed Commissioner Culbertson United States minister to Rumania. Thus two of the commissioners who had scientifically discharged their duties in the sugar investigation were eliminated—Commissioner Culbertson by promotion; Commissioner Lewis—a faithful and incorruptible official who merited reappointment—by demotion.

(11) On June 15, 1925, a little more than a month after Commissioner Culbertson's retirement, and after having held the Tariff Commission's sugar report for many months, President Coolidge announced his refusal to make any change in the tariff on sugar under the flexible provisions. Thus a major report of the commission was ignored and a commission investigation of the first order, which had engaged the services of an expert staff for nearly two years and cost the Government many thousands of dollars, was thrown overboard, following an unprecedented series of lobbying drives and political maneuvers, in some of which the White House actively shared.

LATER TARIFF COMMISSION CONTROVERSIES

Without attempting to present in similar detail the commission's history since the summer of 1925, I may state that during these later days the obstacles thus early erected against a scientific application of the flexible tariff provisions have never been removed. From 1925 on, as in the two preceding years, and due to the same contrasted official standards, sharply different interpretations of facts and law have featured the commission's reports to the President. Those reports must largely be left to speak for themselves. It may, however, be said in regard to transportation—the subject of farthest-reaching consequences and most persistent commission division—that the members of the commission who have insisted on judicial standards have been upheld in their constructions of the law in an opinion of the Attorney General. That case involved the question, on which the commission divided for two years, whether under the law transportation should be added to production costs to enable domestic and foreign goods to meet on even terms in the principal competing market of the United States. The declared object of the flexible tariff is equalized competition in the United States. This can be attained only by including transportation expenses, and the answer of the Attorney General was in the affirmative. Yet to-day, after another two years, the Marvin group are strenuously engaged in nullifying the ruling of the Attorney General by substituting transportation charges based on imaginary movements of articles for the actual charges incurred under the actual competitive conditions investigated by the commission.

COMMISSIONER DENNIS'S EXPERIENCE

Oddly enough, testimony of an exceptional sort as to the right and wrong of such commission issues will be found in the official record of Commissioner Dennis. When he displaced Commissioner Lewis, the background of his appointment apparently boded ill for the commission. His known friendship for President Coolidge disposed him to look, and apparently when appointed he did look, with disapproval on the independent course followed in the sugar investigation by those members of the commission who declined to be swayed by the wishes of President Coolidge. Commissioner Dennis, accordingly, began his official service with every evidence of his intention and desire to cooperate with the Marvin group. His entry on the commission's work placed me in an apparently hopeless minority; the commission was divided 5 to 1. Apart from his uniform courtesy, and outside of the transportation problem, on which he agreed with my long-maintained construction of the law, Commissioner Dennis for months, with unimportant exceptions, threw his vote and influence with the Marvin group. In the halibut case he even signed his name to a report which he privately denounced, and recently he has openly and frankly expressed his regret that he did not, as I did, strongly dissent from, instead of signing, the commission's majority findings in that case. More and more, indeed, with the passing months, Commissioner Dennis, for good reasons and in the name of official self-respect, has found the harmony he originally sought impossible, and has withdrawn from that earlier association. His testimony before the Senate investigating committee is therefore highly significant. Nor is that the end of the story. Without authority to speak for him, I can say in my official capacity that never more vehemently than in recent weeks has Commissioner Dennis expressed his indignation against the methods and prejudgments of the Marvin group, of which Commissioners Brossard and Lowell are now part.

Similarly, the commission's most recent member, Commissioner Dixon, a trained lawyer and experienced in handling tariff questions as a former member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, has been unable to agree with the Marvin group in several of the commission's recent reports, including the log case, which is the most important and the clearest lower-duty case considered by the Tariff Commission since halibut, which followed sugar and linseed oil. It thus appears that, while the Senate investigating committee still hesitates over its report, the old divisions and underlying causes persist. In fact, the commission stands to-day as irreconcilably divided because of the different official standards of its members as in the darkest days of the sugar investigation.

COMMISSIONER DIXON

Can there be any longer the slightest reason to doubt the true explanation? With all his applied political power President Coolidge has failed to annihilate all of the commission's former impartiality, though his course has effectively helped to wreck the commission's usefulness. When Commissioner Glassie's term of office and subsequent recess appointment by the President expired, the opposition Commissioner Glassie had aroused in Congress, by insisting on judging the sugar case, prevented his permanent reappointment. Conditions in 1927 thus unexpectedly paved the way for a successful demand by the minority in Congress for the selection as the successor of Commissioner Glassie of Commissioner Dixon, a high-minded public servant. This selection was made during the Senate committee's investigation of the commission.

COMMISSIONERS MARVIN, BROSSARD, AND LOWELL

The public was much less fortunate, however, in regard to other appointments. Preceding the Senate committee's investigation, when vacancies were created by Commissioner Culbertson's and later by Commissioner Burgess's resignations, Commissioners Brossard and Baldwin were named. After a limited service, during which, to be entirely candid, he was little better than a rubber stamp in the hands of the Marvin group, Commissioner Baldwin resigned, in part, it was said, for reasons of health. He has since been succeeded by Commissioner Lowell.

Commissioners Marvin, Brossard, and Lowell stand to-day a united tariff band, steadily pressing for higher tariff rates and against important reductions, reckless on occasions in their treatment of facts and the law. Commissioner Marvin has been mentioned. I must add my confirmed judgment, which the Senate investigating committee has had ample opportunity to verify, that his membership seriously impairs the usefulness of the commission, which will not have proper credit or respect either at home or abroad among scientists, economists, and disinterested persons, particularly so long as he remains its chairman. Without a background of public service justifying his selection, his position as commissioner and as chairman has exalted a tariff lobbyist at the public's expense. Incomparable opportunities for a former lobbyist have now for years been thrust into his hands through his repeated annual designations for that strategic post by Presidents Harding and Coolidge. No exposures, however discrediting, of bias, partisanship, and the distrust of his associates, have sufficed to break this New England slate. Strangest of all, the stranglehold on the commission is continued by hidden influences. It is well known in Washington that President Coolidge has long ceased personally to consult or place confidence in his own designated Tariff Commission chairman.

Commissioner Brossard has long been known in Washington as a political protégé of Senator Smoot. He was on the staff of the commission before he became a member, and in both relations created an impression of a biased, as distinguished from a scientific or judicial, mind. Members of the Senate investigating committee are aware that while testifying under oath he appeared at times to be cautiously hiding material information within his knowledge which was sought by such members. As a witness he strengthened the view that he is a partisan who wishes to favor certain tariff-protected interests. The record discloses that his appointment was characterized in writing in 1925 by his predecessor, Commissioner Culbertson, President Coolidge's United States minister to Rumania, as follows:

"* * * It's not much of a compliment to me that Brossard is selected to fill my place. If this appointment is to be regarded as a revelation of the President's policy I feel fully justified in leaving the commission. They were certain to put you and me into a minority, and I would have been driven by the force of circumstances to break with my party without saving the commission. * * * I didn't suppose that Coolidge would do the thing so rawly, if he did it at all. Evidently our suspicions were correct and Brossard has been playing with the sugar lobby, and now he has his reward! I can imagine the effect on the staff—upon men like Comer, Clark, De Long, Simpson, Wallace, etc. They must feel that honesty is not the best policy." * * *

Of Commissioner Lowell, the most recent member of the Marvin group, it must be said that he lacks equipment or special qualifications for the duties of the Tariff Commission. In so far as he acts independently he appears to vote prejudices rather than facts. He even seems to take pride in parading his misconception of his official responsibilities. To illustrate: In the Cherry investigation, during the preparation of the final report to the President, a section was inserted purporting to state the separate views of Commissioners Marvin, Brossard, and Lowell. Commissioner Lowell subsequently affirmed that he had not read that section, although he admitted that he knew that it had been offered as the expression of the views of himself and his two associates. On various other occasions he has stated at commission meetings that he is opposed to dissenting statements in commission reports to the President; that he is not "the kind of a man" to dissent and never will dissent, but, instead, "will keep still," no matter how much he may disagree with the contents of such reports.

NECESSITY FOR PERSONAL REFERENCES REGRETTED

It must be evident that these personal references are not recorded without regret. Commissioners Marvin, Brossard, and Lowell have been my official associates for a considerable time. Our official relations have been frank, but, also, with few exceptions, courteous. These commissioners share the pleasant personal traits which lighten our everyday human experience. It is therefore unthinkable that such critical estimates would be offered except for reasons of public necessity. The statements are personal because facts of public consequence are personal. The tragedy of the Tariff Commission is directly traceable to certain tariff commissioners and certain Presidents. And Congress will never correct the disease unless it legislates with eyes and mind open to these essential truths.

OTHER FAILURES OF THE COMMISSION, PARTICULARLY WITH REFERENCE TO LABOR AND AGRICULTURE

This picture of the Tariff Commission would not be complete without brief reference to one or two other of many fateful consequences of the manipulation of that body. The commission has not only failed to meet its impartial duties in regard to changes in tariff rates; other possibilities of far-reaching public service have similarly suffered.

For instance, among the statutory duties imposed on the commission is one calling for reports on the effect of our tariffs "upon the industries and labor of the country." Beneficiaries of excessive tariff rates often prefer imaginative fiction to tariff realities. This statutory duty of the commission awakens little enthusiasm among those who prefer embargoes and monopolies to the restraints of competition.

An open-minded performance of this task by the commission would have disclosed the use of various tariff fallacies to mislead farmers and industrial workers in the United States. If the commission had been properly constituted, long before now it would have clearly pointed out the limited benefits derived by farmers from many agricultural tariff rates. For example, the commission would have convincingly dealt with the unimportance of the tariff for most wheat growers in the United States. It might at this hour be reporting on the question, What does the 42 cents per bushel tariff on wheat, which was lifted to that level because of Canadian competition, have to do with the fact that the American hard spring wheat of the Northwest has lately been selling at prices about 10 cents less per bushel than Canadian hard spring wheat? And the public would already be advised that an increased tariff on corn, for which appeals have been pouring into Washington, offers little hope for the distressed farmers of the Corn Belt, who justly seek to escape from their tragic burdens, even if nothing is offered but an unlikely miracle. Indeed, one can but wonder is these days of easy faith why the growers of the South have not been similarly hypnotized by the assurance that their prosperity can only be guaranteed by a highly protective tariff duty on cotton.

So in the field of the "industrial effects of the customs laws * * * upon the * * * labor of the country," the commission has been under obligations which it has not discharged, and which, constituted as it now is, it can not satisfactorily perform. At the present time, after years spent in assembling information, its membership is such that no report emerges showing that American wages, though relatively higher than foreign, are not in the main the consequence of protective tariffs, but rather of the remarkable skill with which human and other power has been applied to the enormously rich, natural resources of the United States. Some highly protected industries pay wretched wages; and constantly before the commission are such familiar facts as the higher wages paid in the boot and shoe industry, which enjoys no tariff subsidy, than in the highly protected woolen and worsted industries. Similarly, it is common information, the significance of which is, however, often forgotten, that the automobile industry, which recently asked that the tariff be completely removed from motor cars, since the industry fears no world competition whatever, pays much higher wages than highly protected United States industries such as pottery and meat packing. In fact, novelty no longer attaches to the story of efficient mass production. Relatively high wages can be and are paid in our automobile factories, yet the American labor cost of any single automobile is low, and this product of American factories can usually be sold cheaper than the comparable product of foreign countries, in spite of the lower wages paid in such foreign countries. Nor does this experience differ widely from cases of mass production in other domestic industries in which the output is aided by especially valuable natural resources. Indeed, our natural advantages for production have wrought such comparative results through all our history, even in colonial times, as shown by higher wages in many enterprises here than abroad, with or without tariffs, and with low tariffs as well as high.

It is unnecessary to add that a scientific Tariff Commission would not hesitate to show, to the extent statistically determinable, that, while excessive tariffs at times enrich private interests, other tariffs are deceptively meaningless; that, as a rule, tariff duties are more advantageous to most branches of manufacture than to most branches of agriculture; that tariff duties are not likely to bestow equal benefits on both; and that, so far as the articles produced by the great majority of our farmers are concerned, prices are usually determined by market, especially world market, conditions rather than by tariff barriers. This country has nothing to fear through discovering that her rank among industrial nations tends to be advanced rather than retarded under tariff policies of greater liberality than those now in force, permitting, within the limits of fair practices, the reasonable operation of fundamental economic laws.

CONCLUSION

In the face of such continuing offenses, both of omission and commission, I have decided to end my official experience. Until recently I assumed that with two years' knowledge Congress would not fail at this session to grapple with corrective remedies. The appointment of the Senate investigating committee made that expectation reasonable. To be sure, the Senate's confirmation of Commissioners Brossard and Lowell, in the midst of that investigation, pointed the other way. The former was open to challenge as disqualified; the latter in part, because without real understanding of his task. Yet my personal confidence in the final outcome has persisted until now. It is extinguished at last. And I am unwilling to devote to a vanished hope the unexpired two and a half years of my present term of office.

With but three months probably left of the present session of Congress, in a presidential year, the Senate investigating committee is silent. The issue would not be hopeless if a genuine program for a reorganized commission had been set in motion. Instead, Congress has once more voted the commission's annual appropriation. Agriculture is making proper demands for national relief, and it is easier to use the commission to convert farmers to a mistaken belief in tariff salvation than to apply real and permanent agricultural remedies. Under such circumstances, my further official partnership is useless.

Three other reasons strengthen this conviction. The first is that I have done everything possible to aid the investigating committee and the public through various constructive legislative suggestions. The second, that no recess appointment of my successor is probable if I withdraw now. And the third, that sufficient of the congressional session remains to permit insistence on the appointment of an able and upright successor, and to prevent the confirmation of an unfit nominee.

In conclusion may I say that I do not exaggerate the present issue? I fully realize that the manipulation of the Tariff Commission since 1922 is but part of the total picture of present-day Washington. In an era which history may yet summarize as the age of Daugherty, Fall, and Sinclair—in which another governmental body, the Federal Trade Commission, is widely looked upon as the legitimate prey of those who deal in the unfair practices that commission was created to destroy—in which even the national Senate is not immune against the trespass and dictates of powerful lobbies—the fate and fortunes of the Tariff Commission may be thought unimportant. Yet no part of the public edifice can be undermined without danger to the whole structure. Public service still demands public fidelity. And the ancient right of remonstrance remains. An official witness of law violations, I have successively appealed to the President and to Congress. One further dissent is in order. I am, therefore, returning my official commission to the Government.

Very truly,

EDWARD P. COSTIGAN.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WATSON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE, STATE OF INDIANA.

I, F. E. Schortemeier, secretary of state of the State of Indiana, hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a full, true, and complete copy of enrolled Senate Joint Resolution 5, chapter 269, acts of seventy-fifth regular session of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana.

A joint resolution requesting Congress to prepare, support, and secure the enactment of legislation limiting and defining the jurisdiction of the United States courts in public utility and rate cases to the consideration after, not before, the courts of various States have considered the issues involved

Whereas Congress in 1816 created Indiana a sovereign and independent State, with full right to control its local affairs and the corporations it created, and these would include especially utility corporations furnishing water, light, gas, phone service, and other necessities; and

Whereas the growth and development of the State of Indiana and its public utilities reached such proportions in 1913 that it became necessary that careful and proper consideration of the rights of the public and the adequate protection of the public welfare made it necessary for the General Assembly of the State of Indiana to create a public service commission; and

Whereas certain utilities of this State, to wit, the Indianapolis Water Co., the Indiana Bell Telephone Co., the Citizens Gas Co. of Indianapolis, and the Central States Gas Co., of Vincennes, and the Greensburg Water Co., of Greensburg, petitioned the public service commission of the State of Indiana for increased rates for service to the public; and

Whereas such petitions were heard and valuations thereof determined and rates fixed by the Indiana Public Service Commission which were, in the judgment of the commission, fair, reasonable, and just; and

Whereas said utilities, to wit, the Indianapolis Water Co., the Indiana Bell Telephone Co., the Citizens Gas Co., the Central States Gas Co., of Vincennes, and the Greensburg Water Co., did immediately in each case invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal court of the State of Indiana instead of taking their cases to our State courts, alleging that the valuation determined and rates fixed by the public service commission were confiscatory; and

Whereas the laws of the State of Indiana governing the public service commission provide for and authorize any utility or person interested in any rate order to appeal to the circuit or superior court of any county in this State from any order of the commission fixing such rate or rates or valuation; and

Whereas such utilities did in each instance invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal court without first having pursued the remedy provided by the laws of the State of Indiana, giving the right to appeal to the State courts; and

Whereas in each instance the Federal court has fixed a higher valuation and a higher rate than that fixed by the public service commission; and

Whereas the right of the State of Indiana to control its local affairs with reference to such utilities was defeated and prevented; and

Whereas the public service commission of Indiana fixed the valuation of the Indianapolis Water Co. at $16,455,000, the Indiana Bell Telephone Co. at $32,000,000, the Citizens Gas Co. at $12,000,000, the Central States Gas Co. of Vincennes at $482,845, and the Greensburg Water Co. at $225,000; and

Whereas thereafter at hearings in the Federal Court of the District of Indiana the valuations of these public utilities were fixed at the following figures, to wit: The Indianapolis Water Co. at $19,000,000, resulting in increase of rates; Indiana Bell Telephone Co. at $36,000,000, resulting in increase of rates; Citizens Gas Co. at $16,000,000, increasing the rate for gas from 90 cents to $1.20; Central States Gas Co. of Vincennse at $739,572; and the Greensburg Water Co. at $340,000, resulting in increase of rates: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Seventy-fifth General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the United States Senators and Members of Congress representing the State of Indiana be, and they are hereby, respectfully petitioned to prepare, support, and their associates enact legislation limiting the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in all cases that may be filed therein by public utilities seeking relief from orders issued by public service commissions to such utilities as have first exhausted all legal remedies given by the courts of the respective States; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the governor and the secretary of state to the Senators and Members of Congress representing the State of Indiana and the Senators and Congressmen of the other States of the United States.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN RIGHTS IN CUBA

Mr. SHIPSTEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 168), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the Congress of the United States by an amendment (known as the Platt amendment) to the Army appropriation act, approved March 2, 1901, defined the conditions under which the Executive could turn over to the people of Cuba the government of that island; and

Whereas one of such conditions was that certain parts of the said amendment should be included in the constitution of the Cuban government, and also included in a permanent treaty with the United States; and

Whereas the specified provisions of such amendment were made a part of the constitution of the Republic of Cuba, and also embodied in a treaty signed May 22, 1903; and

Whereas certain of the provisions of said amendment so made a part of the constitution of Cuba, and so embodied in the permanent treaty with Cuba, were designed and intended to afford protection to the property and persons of citizens of the United States resident in such island; and

Whereas many citizens of the United States resident in Cuba claim to have been denied the protection provided and guaranteed in said treaty and constitutional amendment: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is hereby directed to cause an investigation to be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether said claims so made by American citizens are true, and, if found to be true, to recommend such procedure and measures as will secure to said citizens of the United States the protection of life and property, as provided in said treaty and constitutional amendment.

SALES OF FOREIGN MANUFACTURED LEATHER

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I send a resolution to the desk which I ask to have read and lie over under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 169) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is hereby requested to investigate and report to the Senate the extent of sales of foreign manufactured leather from goat skins and kid skins in the United States since January 1, 1925, and the rates of wages paid workers in the tanning of black and colored kid in the United States and competing countries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania is asking for the present consideration of the resolution, but that it may lie over under the rule.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That it may lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF STAMPED ENVELOPES

DELAWARE RIVER BRIDGE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2800) authorizing E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River at or near Burlington, N. J., which were, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "successors and assigns (or his or their"; on page 1, line 6, to strike out ")"; on page 2, line 7, to strike out "successors and assigns (or his or their"; on page 2, line 8, to strike out ")"; on page 2, lines 20 and 21, to strike out "successors and assigns (or his or their"; on page 2, line 22, to strike out ")"; on page 4, line 1, after the word "shall," to insert "at any time"; on page 4, line 11, to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty"; on page 4, lines 24 and 25, to strike out "successors and assigns (or his or their"; on page 4, line 25, to strike out ")"; on page 5, line 16, to strike out "successors and assigns (or his or their"; on page 5, line 17, to strike out ")"; on page 5, line 18, to strike out the word "its" and insert "his"; on page 6, lines 1 and 2, to strike out "successors and assigns (or his or their"; on page 6, line 2, to strike out ")"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing E. K. Morse, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River at or near Burlington, N. J."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator explain briefly the effect of his motion?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is a bridge bill in the usual form except that it is made to an individual, as many of them are, and contains the words "successors and assigns," which, of course, are inappropriate in a case of an individual. The House struck out those words quite properly. That is all that is done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think there can be no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1181) authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended, which was, on page 2, to strike out all after "270)," in line 3, down to and including the word "expended" in line 11, and insert "available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $2,000,000; in all for this period, $4,000,000."

Mr. MCNARY. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MCNARY, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. RANSDELL conferees on the part of the Senate.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate bill 777.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I hope the bill will pass. A similar bill was first introduced in 1921 and passed by the Senate in 1922, and again in 1925. The officers covered by the bill are the only officers for whom no retirement has been provided by previous legislation. I think it is fair and just to these emergency officers that they should be given the privileges set out in the bill. An emergency officer who has suffered 30 per cent disability in line of duty is entitled to this consideration.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss the matter in detail, but I hope an early vote may be had.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Florida a question. I understood him to say that the pending bill is identical with the bill which we passed on previous occasions. Did I correctly understand the Senator?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not mean to say that it is identical. I am not sure about that, but in substance it is the same measure.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not yet had an opportunity to give a careful study to the bill, but I have been told——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, as a matter of fact I think the bill is identical with the bill which has heretofore passed the Senate on two different occasions.

Mr. WILLIS. I recall that we passed a similar bill and I supported it, but I have been told that there have been some changes in the pending bill. However, the Senator advises me now that it is substantially the same bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is substantially the same bill that was passed in 1922 and again in 1925.

Mr. WILLIS. Is that the understanding of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; it is practically the same bill that has passed before in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators here this morning who were not present yesterday afternoon, and while I do not intend to repeat all that I said then, I want to say now for the benefit of Senators who were not here that the bill is opposed for three reasons, most of which are not known to the individuals in the veterans' organizations who have advocated the bill. I believe that when the enlisted men of the World War Army learn what is in the bill they will be almost unanimous in their denunciation of us for having passed it, if we do pass it.

The bill carries an increased expense for officers now rated at 30 per cent or more disabled of only $2,060,000. That amount doubtless will be increased by the addition of other officers to the eligible class. The total amount being spent by the Veterans' Bureau is $405,000,000 a year—at least that much was spent last year—so that the additional cost, while it is a large amount, is not important compared with the aggregate.

But here is a point that Senators ought to bear in mind: The bill creates the most cruel and inexcusable discrimination in favor of commissioned officers and against the enlisted men of the Army. The bill will affect practically 3,000 officers out of a total of 243,000 veterans who are now receiving compensation for disability. The other 240,000 get absolutely nothing out of the provisions of this bill. The bill does not graduate the amount of compensation that is paid according to the degree of the disability—not at all. It does not graduate it according to the occupation of the injured veteran or the degree to which his efficiency in that occupation has been reduced. Here is the way it works: If a major is classed as 30 per cent or more disabled he gets a retirement pay of $2,250 a year. The result is that while for comparatively trivial injuries a major gets that $2,250 a year, the severely crippled enlisted veteran, one whose condition is most pitiable, can not get more than $1,200 a year.

Now, what are the enlisted men of the World War Army going to say to Senators who voted for this bill when they discover that a major who is a clerk and has lost two fingers gets nearly twice as much as does the enlisted man of any occupation whose back is broken or who has lost two legs, and who gets only $1,200 a year? We shall never be able to explain why we have discriminated against the enlisted man in favor of the officer, and not in favor of all officers, mind you. The second lieutenant gets nothing from this bill. The second lieutenant who has lost both legs will get $1,200 a year, and no more, just the same as the enlisted man, while the higher-ranking officers with comparatively slight disabilities will get twice and more than twice as much as the junior officers and the enlisted men.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Pennsylvania, my recollection of the hearings is that it developed that the enlisted men would fare better under the compensation adjustment provided under the Veterans' Bureau act than they would if they were provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, if they were included in the bill on the basis of their salary while in the Army, they would not get as much as they are now getting; but why discriminate between injured men according to the pay they then received? Why not grade them according to their civilian occupations and the extent of their injuries? These men are all civilians; they were only temporarily in the Army; the Army pay was but a brief incident in their lives.

This bill proposes to compensate injured officers according to the pay they received during their temporary service, giving them three-fourths of that amount for life. It pays no attention to the degree of their injuries further than to provide that the disability must be 30 per cent or more. It also discriminates between officers in a perfectly cruel and inexcusable way. If we take the regular schedules of the Veterans' Bureau and see how this measure will work out, we must discover such inexcusable contrasts as those pointed out yesterday between the chemist and the bacteriologist, each of whom may have lost a leg at the knee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania tell us what these men would get under the bill?

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico for that purpose, and then I will answer the question of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CUTTING. Does not that discrimination exist between the bacteriologist and the chemist under the present arrangement; that is, under the law and regulations of the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The present discrimination amounts to about $4 a month, while this bill will make it amount to over $200 a month.

Mr. CUTTING. But the fact that such discrimination exists will not be due to the passage of this proposed legislation?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The fact that the discrimination will be multiplied many fold will be due to the passage of this measure. The Veterans' Bureau has constructed a rating schedule under which, merely for the purpose of illustration, I pointed out that the bacteriologist who loses his leg at the knee is rated 29 per cent disabled, while the chemist who loses his leg at the knee is rated 33 per cent disabled.

Mr. CUTTING. Could not that particular discrimination be corrected by legislation directed toward the Veterans' Bureau rating system rather than bringing it up in connection with this particular measure?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course it could; but the rating schedule contains thousands and thousands of items; it is carefully made up, and it has met the general approval of the Veterans' Bureau and of all who have had to do with it. We may eliminate this, if we will, and yet 10,000 other similar inconsistencies will still remain.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] will realize that in making the discrimination between the bacteriologist and the chemist the Veterans' Bureau has obviously considered the fact that the chemist while at work must walk rapidly back and forth at his table when he is carrying on his experiments, while the bacteriologist is chiefly engaged in sitting at a table with a microscope. Therefore, although both may be similarly disabled, the degree of disability incurred by a former bacteriologist while rated at 29 per cent is not quite so great as the degree of disability incurred by a former chemist who is rated 33 per cent disabled. To-day there is no injustice even if the Senator from New Mexico, as I can see by the expression of his face, thinks that both the bacteriologist and the chemist are equally affected and both should have received ratings of 29 per cent or both should have received ratings of 33 per cent; but the present rating making a difference of only $4 a month does not matter very much. The board which has these ratings to make is able to do so without any great amount of pressure being brought; but if this bill should go into effect, when the former bacteriologist finds that he continues to receive only $29 a month while the former chemist receives over $200 a month, then the pressure will be tremendous to increase the rating of the bacteriologist from 29 per cent to 30 per cent; and it is almost safe to say that no doctor will successfully resist an appeal to go contrary to what he believes is the actual rating in order to give the bacteriologist 1 per cent more so that he may get $200 a month more.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, understand, if you please, that the bacteriologist and the chemist are merely illustrative cases taken from the occupations listed in the rating schedules and with thousands of varieties of injuries to apply them to. It is easy to go right down this 30 per cent line as to all occupations and all injuries and find similar contrasts that will horrify Senators, as I hope the illustration that I have given horrifies them.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to finish, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would not the same discrepancy which exists in the Senator's hypothetical case of these two scientists also exist as between an enlisted man and a Regular officer who has been retired?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. As I think was said at least fifty times yesterday, if it is desired to compare Regular officers and their system of retirement pay that has existed for generations, and to ignore all the reasons for the existence of that system, the contrast can be found; yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly. Mr. President, as I understand, the premises upon which this proposed legislation is based is that it is the intent to place the emergency officers of the Army upon the same retirement basis as the Regular officers and as the emergency officers of the Marine Corps and Navy have already been placed by action of Congress.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This bill does not propose to place them on the same basis as the Regular officers by any means. It requires that emergency officers be 30 per cent disabled in order to obtain retirement pay, whereas it is not necessary for a Regular officer to be disabled at all in order to get it. If he is marked class B, after a certain number of years of service, he gets limited retirement pay; if he has served for 32 years and asks for retirement, although he is perfectly fit, he is retired on retirement pay; if he reaches 64 years of age, and is still perfectly fit, he is retired on retirement pay, and there is no 30 per cent degree of disability line applicable to him. This bill is merely a step in that direction, taken for the purpose of benefiting a comparatively few of the injured emergency officers of the World War. There were about 12,000 of them disabled to some extent during the war, and this bill picks out 3,000 of them for exceptionally favored treatment. I say that it is an absolutely indefensible distinction to draw.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Has not Congress already drawn that distinction in so far as the emergency officers in the Marine Corps and the Navy are concerned?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. A small number of officers of the Navy and Marine Corps received the benefit of a retirement measure, which lasted for one year and which was attached to an appropriation bill back in 1920. A still larger number of naval and Marine Corps officers did not take advantage of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator from Maine if that is the correct statement of the history of the legislation?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, a larger number of officers were affected by that legislation than would come in under this bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. On the present ratings, yes; but a very large number of Navy and Marine Corps officers are urging the amendment which the Senator from Maine has offered so as to bring them in, because at present they do not get the benefit of that old provision.

Mr. HALE. Not a large number; I think there are 202 in all.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Veterans' Bureau showed something less than 200 in the report made last January, which is a pretty considerable number.

Now, let me point out one more distinction, and I have finished. An enlisted man who was a noncommissioned officer of a line regiment, particularly one who was first sergeant in a company or a battery of a line regiment is one of the finest types of Americans that I know anything about. In passing this bill we say to that man, even if a machine-gun bullet went through his spine and left his legs paralyzed, even if his two arms were blown off, even if his legs were blown off, he is only fit to get one-half as much as is given to a major or a lieutenant colonel whose injury, in all moral certainty, had nothing whatever to do with the war.

Take just such cases as this: I had a friend who came to Washington on November 6, 1918, a civilian, with no military training whatsoever. He was given a commission as a lieutenant colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army, and he was a member of the World War Army for exactly six days, because he was discharged the day after the armistice. Under the present legislation, which is intentionally liberal so as to make it easy for soldiers who suffer constitutional diseases traceable back to war time to connect their injury with their service, it is provided that insanity or tuberculosis occurring prior to January 1, 1925, is conclusively presumed to be due to one's war service. Apply that to this lieutenant colonel who served six days in uniform in Washington. If that man were to have gone crazy prior to the 1st of January, 1925, he would now go on retirement pay at $2,625 a year. How can you explain that to the enlisted man who was cruelly wounded in action?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this friend of his has gone crazy?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. He has not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Pennsylvania keeps reciting these hypothetical cases. Does the Senator know of any actual cases?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, I know of actual cases. I have thousands of them here, if the Senator from Connecticut will allow me to show them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I much prefer to have the Senator discuss actual cases than to have him discuss hypothetical cases.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. All right; I will give the Senator some actual cases from my own State.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, what I should prefer even more is that the Senator suggest some modifications, some amendments to this bill, that might avert these inequalities.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. How can we do it?

Mr. GLASS. That is what I want to know.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. How can you start with a false premise that men are entitled to more because they had a commission than because they had an enlistment contract? How can you base compensation on that, disregarding entirely the degree of their injury, or the kind of occupation that they are solely fitted to follow, and the effect of that injury on that occupation? It disregards the two essential elements in the measurement of disability, and sets up a wholly false standard. You can not amend it, I am afraid, to make it any less unjust than it now is.

Let me give the Senator from Wisconsin an illustration that comes within my own acquaintance.

Here is Mr. William John McGregor, of Wilkinsburg, Pa.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not ask the Senator to give the names.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad to do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator stated yesterday that he preferred not to give them; and I should not like to be responsible for their names being given if the Senator thinks there is any reason why they should not be.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In this case there is no reason. This man is a distinguished citizen of Allegheny County, western Pennsylvania. He was a first lieutenant of Infantry in the World War. He was struck by a shell, and both of his legs were blown off. He had previously served gallantly in several actions. He was a physician; that was his occupation; but he wanted the front-line service, and he got it. He is classed as permanently totally disabled. He receives from the Veterans' Bureau $100 per month, plus a $50 allowance to enable him to have an attendant, because he is so completely crippled. He gets $150 a month under the present law. This law would cut him down to $125 per month.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, he does not have to take advantage of it if he does not want to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; of course not, and he will not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If he prefers to stay under the bureau rating, he has the option of doing so.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely; he has the option; but I am trying to show you what this law does not do for deserving cases and what it does do for undeserving cases.

Now I want to call your attention to another case in Pennsylvania, which we will leave nameless for obvious reasons—another physician. He lives down near Philadelphia. He is now 54 years old. He never got anywhere near the front. He never left the United States. He is classed permanently totally disabled because he has diabetes; and the bets are a hundred to one that if he had never seen the Army, and if there had never been any war, he would have had the same case of diabetes that he has to-day. This bill advances that gentleman—and I am not making fun of him at all—from $100 to $150.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. If this man is given total disability for diabetes, it must be because the examining physicians decided that it was caused by his service in the Army.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is because the first symptoms of diabetes occurred while he was holding his commission. It was an injury incurred in line of duty, therefore, or a disease contracted within the meaning of the law; and he gets the compensation, although the Senator knows, as I do, that the chances are a hundred to one that he would have had the same diabetes if there never had been any war at all.

Now, let me go on and give you some more cases.

Mr. FRAZIER. It seems to me that is quite a criticism on the physicians who pass on these cases, if the Senator is going to make a statement of that kind.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I do not think it is a criticism on anybody.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from North Dakota—I think he is on the Pensions Committee; I was on it for a number of years—if it is not a fact that thousands of persons draw pensions awarded to them many, many years—30 or 40 years after the close of the Civil War—upon the hypothesis that the injuries now existing are traceable back to their service in the war?

Mr. FRAZIER. I would not say there are thousands of such cases. Undoubtedly there are some, though. There may be thousands, as far as that goes; but even if there are, I do not know that there is anything so very wrong about it.

Mr. KING. Oh, I am not making any criticism. I am merely asking if it is not a fact that that is the case.

Mr. FRAZIER. There are a great many; I do not know how many.

Mr. KING. And may I say to the Senator there are more than 42,000 applications now filed with the Veterans' Bureau by the reserve officers—and there were less than 200,000 of them—more than one-fifth of them having already filed applications claiming disabilities resulting from the war, and, of course, if they establish them they will immediately go on the list.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, if the last doctor he mentioned, who is rated as totally disabled, is actually totally disabled, may I ask the Senator whether he feels that $150 a month is too much for him to receive?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not begrudge him the $150 a month in the least; but I say if you are going to give it to him you ought to give it to the veteran who is worse disabled from service that undoubtedly caused his injury.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If a man is totally disabled, it seems to me that it is not a question of the degree of his disability, because that has already been fixed as being total.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; and therefore if two veterans are completely and totally disabled, and one of them, furthermore, is not able to get around because his legs were shot off, I say it is a hideous discrimination to treat the one who still has his legs and can get around and do something better than you treat the man who can not get around at all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, I do not know anything about this diabetic doctor's condition, but he may be as completely disabled as the man who has lost both limbs.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. All right. Let me give the Senator some more instances.

Here is another physician who lives in eastern Pennsylvania who is classed as permanently totally disabled from epilepsy. The disease began to show itself during the war service. Now, we know as surely as we know anything in medicine that epilepsy is very largely hereditary. The chances are that that man's epilepsy goes back for its cause to the Napoleonic wars instead of the World War, or a century or more before that; and yet, because his disease came in his war service, and because it disables him completely, he is entitled to the $100 for permanent disability. This bill would raise him to $187.50 a month.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let me finish the contrast, and then I will yield.

Right next to that is a second lieutenant whose right wrist was fractured, who had a machine-gun bullet through his right leg, who suffers to-day from general paralysis; and this bill, if he elected to go in under it, would cut him down from $100 to $93.75 a month.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, he does not have to be cut down, does he, unless he elects to do so?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am talking about the terms of the legislation that the Senator seems to be about to sponsor, and I am trying to tell him now some of the questions that he is going to have to answer when totally disabled enlisted men come to see him after this bill has become a law. To that extent I think I am doing him a good service.

Mr. CUTTING. May I say that I have been answering those questions for nine years to the complete satisfaction of the totally disabled enlisted men I have talked to on the subject.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Here is another one that the Senator might perhaps be asked to answer——

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYSON. I wish to ask the Senator if these things would not have happened just the same, would they not have been retired just the same, if they had been Regular Army officers?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; I grant that.

Mr. TYSON. The whole theory of this bill is that it is trying to put the emergency officers on an equal basis with the Regular Army officers. I should be glad if the Senator would answer why an emergency officer who goes into the war and suffers the same injury under the same conditions should not be retired under the same conditions as a Regular Army officer is going to be retired under like conditions. That is the point he has never answered, and can not answer, as I understand.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If we are going to discuss the matter from that standpoint, perhaps the Senator will explain to me why he limits the benefits of his bill to officers who are 30 per cent or more disabled. The regular retirement is not limited in that way.

Mr. TYSON. It is because of the fact that that is supposed to be about as fair a way as we can limit the thing.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Why limit it at all? The regulars are not limited.

Mr. TYSON. It is a question of opinion, after all is said and done. It may be very hard to draw the line. At least, we can not tell exactly whether a man ought to be retired or not. You know very well that it has to be, after all, the judgment of the doctors who examine a man; and this 30 per cent has been considered about as fair a proposition as we can give to the Senate and to the country, and one that will come as near doing justice to all officers concerned as any that we can find.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Why does the Senator put in the 30 per cent at all? The regular is not confronted with any 30 per cent.

Mr. TYSON. The Legion wanted to put in 20 per cent in 1923; and the Military Affairs Committee would not permit 20 per cent to be put in, but insisted upon putting in 30 per cent. That is the reason why it is not lower than it is.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But the regular officer is not confronted with any per cent. He goes before a retiring board, and they say whether in fact he is disabled.

Mr. TYSON. That is very true; but this is the best we could do with it. If we can not give exact justice, we want to give all the justice we can.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator would know how to frame the bill so as to provide that the emergency officer should go before a retiring board, too; would he not? If you want to prevent any contrast between regular and temporary officers, why do you not give the temporary officer the privilege of going before a retiring board?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator vote for the bill if it is amended so as to carry out the views of the Senator in that regard?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I most certainly will not. Furthermore, you say you are trying to avoid any contrast between the two classes of officers. The regular has the privilege of retirement for age. Why do you not give that privilege to the emergency officer, and give every one of them who is 64 years old a service pension?

Mr. TYSON. We are undertaking only to retire officers who are disabled. The officers of age are not asking for this retirement, and they are satisfied to have it based on 30 per cent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The trouble with this bill is, Mr. President, that it is based on a false premise, and it can not be amended so as to do justice. It starts out by forgetting all about the enlisted man, and it undertakes to correct a supposed injustice by comparing regular officers and temporary officers, although their two cases are not comparable. Basing a bill on that contrast, and ignoring all of the second lieutenants and enlisted men of the Army, is going to create a much greater discrimination than there possibly could be said to exist to-day, and is going to be bitterly resented by the people against whom you are discriminating.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that every organization of veterans in this country has indorsed this bill. If there were any organization one might think would be opposed to this bill, it would be the organization of disabled veterans of the World War, enlisted men. I have here a long resolution of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War passed in Cincinnati, Ohio. I do not wish to take up the time to read it, but it indorses this bill in unmeasured terms.

I will say, furthermore, that every reputable organization in this country that has considered this matter has already indorsed this bill. It has been before the public for nine years, and to say that the enlisted men who take any interest in this matter are not informed as to the bill, it seems to me is making a misstatement of fact. I can not imagine how people could be more thoroughly informed as to any bill than they are about this bill. I have had more correspondence, and I dare say every other Senator, and every Member of the House, for that matter, has had more correspondence and more indorsement of this bill perhaps than of any other bill that has been before Congress in the last 10 years. It seems to me people are fully informed of it. They indorse it in the highest terms.

In reference to the statement that it has not been fully discussed before the American Legion conventions, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that at the Omaha convention, some few years ago, the matter was brought to the floor of the convention, and a legionnaire who had formerly favored this measure, but who now, as a Member of Congress, is opposing it, took the floor of the convention and appealed to the legionnaires to prevent discrimination against the enlisted men, and to vote against a continued advocacy of this measure. That Congressman spoke upon the subject twice, in an appealing and persuasive manner, but his appeals to the veterans to desert the disabled officers failed in its purpose, and the convention voted overwhelmingly to continue this fight for justice. Since that time no one has spoken against the measure on the floor of a Legion convention.

It seems to me that that is sufficient to indicate that the measure has been fully discussed before the conventions which have been held during the last nine years, and I believe that the enlisted men, and every one concerned in this matter, is fully informed of the situation. If there is anybody who does not indorse it, I am not aware of it.

It appears to me that we have had time enough to find out whether or not the disabled veterans of the World War, the enlisted men, and officers indorse it or not. We have had nothing else but indorsements from every sort and kind of organization from all over this country and the press of the country. I have failed to note a single editorial or statement made in any paper that failed to indorse this legislation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Tennessee that I think one of the reasons why the press of the country have indorsed this legislation, and why repeated conventions of the American Legion and other veterans' organizations have indorsed it, is a failure on their part to understand the technical term, "retirement" in the Army? These indorsements are due to the constant repetition of the statement that we have heard on the floor here, not only within the last two days, but within the last five or six years, since the debate first began, that this is a measure to put emergency officers of the World War on the same basis as Regular officers in case of retirement when they are disabled, when that is not true. The reason why people do not know it is not true is because they are not familiar with retirement in the Regular Army. The proponents of this bill are asking for the emergency officers a kind of retirement privilege and payment due to injuries received during the war which the officers of the Regular Army do not receive.

As I stated yesterday—and it seems as though it ought not to be necessary to state it again to-day, but it is difficult for some persons to believe it—a Regular officer retired for injuries received during the World War is not retired at the rank he held during the war, but at his permanent rank. The Senator from Tennessee himself has advocated legislation before the Military Affairs Committee to give certain friends of his in the Regular Army the titles they held during the war. He has said that it would not increase their pay; he merely wants certain officers who were retired with the regular rank of colonel to receive the retired rank of General, because they held the rank of brigadier or major general during the World War.

We had two or three brilliant lieutenant generals during the World War in the Regular Army. They were not retired with the rank of lieutenant general, or with 75 per cent of the pay of that rank. The officers retired in the Regular Army after the World War were retired with the pay of their regular rank, which was part of their contract, part of the equity which they had earned through years of service. If an officer in the Regular Army during the World War, a recent graduate of West Point and having a commission as a second lieutenant in the Regular Army, had gone to France in charge of a battalion, as some of them did, he would have had the temporary grade of major, as many of them did. Had he then been injured and retired, he would not have retired with the grade of major, or with a major's pay as the Senator from Tennessee knows perfectly well.

If a civilian, like myself, coming into the Army, fortunately receiving a field officer's commission, without previous service in the Army, or very little of it, and having a major's commission, was injured or disabled so as to receive benefits under this bill, he will not receive the benefits of a second lieutenant, he will receive the benefits of a major. He is not to be treated like a Regular officer.

The truth is that this bill does for the emergency officer what we do not do for the regular officer, and the country does not know it; the veterans do not know it. There are very few people in the country, very few men in Congress, even, who understand all the provisions of retirement in the Regular Army. That is one of the reasons why there has been so much sympathy for this bill, because it was supposed that it gave to the emergency officers the privileges which they would have had had they been retired from the Regular Army; and that is not true.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether it is not true that all Regular Army officers had their retirement pay increased in the pay act of 1922, and whether that does not more or less equalize the situation as between the Regular Army officers and the temporary officers who served during the war?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President, because by that act, my recollection is, we increased the pay all through the Army. We increased the pay of all classes of officers. We increased the pay so that it would depend on length of service, which is the proper way for it to be done; and in order to create no injustices with the regular officers retiring after that date, as compared with those retired previously, we raised the rates of officers who had previously retired, so that they would receive the amount which they would have gotten had they been retired after that date.

Mr. CUTTING. Perhaps I did not make myself very clear. My understanding was that the Regular officer who was raised a couple of grades during his temporary service in the war had about the proportionate amount of extra retirement pay given him through the pay act of 1922. This measure, as I understand it, bases the pay of the emergency retired officers on the pay that they would have received at the time of the war. Does not that equalize the two?

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no, Mr. President; the differences are great.

Everyone in the Senate has the highest regard for the former Senator from New York, Mr. Wadsworth, who made a very careful study of all Army matters, who was the author of most of the bills in connection with the national defense, so far as the Army was concerned, during the many years of his services here. I should like to have the Secretary read a copy of a letter which Senator Wadsworth sent out to those who criticized him for his attitude on this bill, which explains, in the language of an expert on these matters, exactly why he was opposed to this legislation, which, on the face of it, appears to so many people to be fair and just, but which actually is unjust, unfair, and un-American.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

COPY OF LETTER BY SENATOR WADSWORTH REGARDING RETIREMENT OF DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

I have your letter of March 20 in which you ask me a number of questions concerning the emergency officers' retirement bill. To tell the honest truth, it was a matter of considerable surprise to the Congress to find that in the hurry of war-time legislation a provision had been inserted in one of the naval appropriation bills providing for the retirement, at three-fourths pay, of Naval Reserve officers and Marine Reserve officers. No such suggestion was made to the Congress relating to the National Army or National Guard serving in the war. For some time after the cessation of hostilities the provision of the naval appropriation bill referred to above remained upon the statute books. But finally the number of Naval Reserve officers applying for retirement under its provisions became so great that the Congress, acting upon a very clear intimation from President Harding, decided that these provisions should terminate. According to my best recollection, the Congress fixed October 1, 1921, as the upset date for the operation of this retirement machinery. I remember very well the character of the discussion indulged in at the time. There was a strong feeling among many Members of the Congress that a mistake had been made in the war-time legislation. Of course, men differed in their views upon this matter at that time as they do now. I am merely giving you a little sketch of what occurred.

Let me answer your questions in a general way. The fault I find in this kind of legislation is just this: Instead of disability being compensated by the Government in accordance with its severity it is to be compensated in accordance with rank. If a first sergeant loses his right arm he receives from the Government something like $70 or $80 a month under the World War veterans' act. If the emergency officers' retirement bill goes through, a captain who has lost his right arm will receive from the Government three-fourths of his active-duty pay, an amount something like three times as much as that received by the sergeant. If this proposed law goes through a major will get at least twice as much compensation for his injuries as will a second lieutenant suffering exactly the same injuries. In other words, by using the retirement-pay schedules as a basis for compensation for injuries we are injecting into our pension system a series of class distinctions. Many men who served in the ranks, well-educated young men with good prospects, made just as great a sacrifice proportionately when they went into the service as did a number of those who were commissioned as officers. I do not see how we are going to defend a system which extends to the injured officers such tremendously greater compensation than is extended to the men.

It is all very well to say that the enlisted men have no objection to it at this time, but the time is bound to come when they will protest against it before some future Congress and demand that they receive as much compensation as the officers for similar injuries. For many years our compensation or pension policy, as applied to our emergency armies, has operated to treat all men alike, regardless of rank or grade. This bill may pass—it has passed the Senate upon two former occasions—but I venture the prophesy that should it become law it will come back to plague the Congresses of the future.

One other feature in the situation should be noted. The World War veterans' act carries very wise provisions for financial aid to the widow and minor children of a disabled man after his death. If the provisions of the World War veterans' act relating to compensation and financial aid to the widows and children are no longer to apply to the disabled emergency officers, and if those officers are to get their compensation in the future in the form of retired pay, then their widows and minor children will have no protection. It must be remembered that according to the retired-pay provisions of the law the family of a retired officer gets nothing after his death. I doubt if all the disabled emergency officers have thought of this.

One more observation. A good deal of confusion exists in the minds of many people in relation to the retirement system in the Regular Army, and as a result of this confusion a contention is made that the emergency officers should have the same retirement privilege. There is really no analogy between the two. The retirement system in the Regular Army and Navy has been in existence for a good many years. It was found wise to establish such a system in order to persuade young men to give up their prospects for making money and to go into the regular military service as a life career. The pay of Regular officers is notoriously low. The law provides that they may be retired in their old age or in the event they are injured to such an extent that they can not perform active field duty. This assurance of protection for them in their old age or in the event they are incapacitated is, in a very true sense, a deferred payment. It should not be regarded purely as a pension. Rather, it is an element of their contract with the Government in which they agree to serve for a certain amount of pay, present and deferred, and, logically, that pay must be computed in accordance with a combination of two elements, rank and length of service. Sometimes it happens that a young officer in the Regular Army is seriously incapacitated very shortly after his entrance into the service, and cases of that kind—there are only a few—are cited as arguments to persuade us that young emergency officers who have served in the emergency army should receive exactly the same treatment. This argument is appealing until we realize the significance and intent of the retirement system for the regular services. These cases are exceptions which, in my judgment, go to prove the soundness of the rule.

You ask me why I am concerned at the prospect of granting retirement privileges and pay to reserve and National Guard officers who may be injured while on active duty in time of peace. In these cases I think the considerations mentioned above would apply. The National Guard is full of young enlisted men of fine education and good prospects. Generally speaking, they sacrifice about as much as their officers. I think we can not give a pension to the officer injured in time of peace four or five times greater than we would give to the enlisted man similarly injured. The system would break down under the strain incident to such a discrimination.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I would like to have the Senator comment, if he will, upon a situation which appeals to me very strongly in connection with the proposed legislation. In a book by Leonard P. Ayres, of the General Staff, which is published by the Government Printing Office, I find that he states in effect that 2,191 Army officers were killed in action or died of wounds received in action during the war. There were three classes of officers in the Army. A further analysis of the list shows that 2,040, or 93 per cent, of those officers who were killed in action came from one class—that is, the emergency class—not now provided for, the other two classes having been provided for. The remainder of the officers wounded were Army officers, 151 in number, or 7 per cent.

It is reasonable to assume, if 93 per cent of the officers killed in action were from the emergency army, that a similar proportion of officers actually wounded, not staff officers in Washington but actually wounded in action, came from the emergency army. The unfairness or inconsistency of the situation appeals to me very strongly that we are taking care of 7 per cent, leaving aside all the desk officers who may have contracted some disease that could be chargeable to the war, and considering alone the combat officers. Assuming that 93 per cent is a proper proportion, we are taking care of 7 per cent and absolutely leaving to the general act the great bulk of officers wounded, which we assume is in the neighborhood of 93 per cent.

What is the Senator's comment as to the consistency or justness of that view of the problem?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, it does seem on the face of it to be a very great injustice. As the Senator well knows, nearly all the company officers in our great Army were emergency officers. Practically all the regular officers became general officers or field officers. Consequently the great brunt of the front-line fighting fell upon emergency officers. I confess that if the bill were in line with one introduced some years ago in the House, which gave benefits of retirement to officers seriously wounded in battle, I should regard it very differently.

I have before me a bill which was introduced some years ago for the officers of the Civil War, providing that those who had lost an eye or leg or arm or had been otherwise seriously disabled should be retired. It is significant that not one of the volunteer veteran officers of the Civil War who served in Congress ever asked for the privilege of retirement, like the regular officers, as is being asked to-day by the volunteer officers or the emergency officers of the World War.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that occasionally from 1866 down to 1914 efforts were made by some of the members of the Grand Army of the Republic to secure retirement privileges for volunteer officers of the same character as those which were subsequently given to the Regular Army officers, but Congress always uniformly turned a deaf ear to those provisions and stated that that was against the theory of retirement; that retirement was not a pension; that it was a provision by which to secure efficient men for the Regular Army, and that retirement privileges were in the nature of deferred payments. Senator Edmunds and other leading Senators who had been in the Army as officers and who were in the House and Senate, uniformly turned down those propositions, so that reserve or volunteer officers of the Civil War never had those privileges.

If we are going to pass this bill I shall insist that we take care of the officers of the Civil War who are still living. Why not give them retirement privilege? Why not give the same privileges to the officers of the Spanish-American War? Why discriminate?

It seems to me we are now asked to embark upon a policy which has been frowned upon from the beginning and has received no support from Congress; a policy which to me is very unwise and will result quite disastrously, in my opinion, to our military system and will impose upon the country burdens that we do not quite appreciate, because just as sure as the sun shines the thousands and thousands of brave boys who fought in the trenches—and I have had letters from scores and scores of them—will insist that if their brothers, many of whom were no better than they intellectually and otherwise, but who happened to get commissions, are to get the advantages of retirement, then the boys who fought in the trenches and were wounded and suffered disabilities should receive the same sort of treatment, and we will have demands made upon Congress for the purpose of removing those discriminations.

So far as I am concerned, I can see no reason why the boy who enlisted and fought bravely and was wounded upon the battle field should not receive the same treatment as his brother who happened to be fortunate enough to get a captain's or major's commission.

Mr. EDGE. Is the Senator quite right in using the word "retirement"? Does not the bill refer alone to wounds contracted or other disability?

Mr. KING. Oh, no. I have knowledge of a very large number of those officers who are beneficiaries who never fought in France.

Mr. EDGE. It is not a retirement bill. It is a payment bill for wounds or disease contracted in the Army. It is in the same category, but does not provide retirement for age.

Mr. KING. Surely it is retirement. It is to place the reserve officers theoretically upon the same basis as the Regular officers and, as has been shown, those who are to get the benefit of the provisions of this bill are placed in a far superior position to many of the Regular officers.

Mr. EDGE. It is predicated, as I understand the bill, upon wounds and disease contracted in the service and not upon time of enlistment, as a retirement bill is always predicated.

Mr. KING. What I am contending for is that the boys who did suffer disability, whether upon the battle field or whether they were clerks, if they see that officers who were clerks or who were stationed here in Washington in the various departments and contracted some disease, or at least it is alleged they contracted some ailment, are retired upon three-quarters pay for life; the boy who fought upon the battle field and in the trenches will insist that he be given the same amount of compensation as such officer.

Mr. EDGE. I will admit I see some justice in that position. I have always felt that the provisions of the bill should go beyond the commissioned officers. I see equity in that proposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut suffer a further interruption?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I had brought to my attention two or three years ago the case of two brothers. One, as soon as the war came along, enlisted and was among the first to get overseas, fought at Argonne and in some of the most bloody conflicts during the war, and was wounded. He has, as I recall, a 60 per cent rated disability. His brother waited and, through the interposition of friends, got a commission. Concededly he was no better than the boy who went to the front. The boy who went to the front was a university boy and would soon have had his A. B. The boy who got the commission never was at the front. He was engaged in clerical activities as a captain. When the flu epidemic was on, he had it, and it left him with a disability rated at 30 per cent. He would get $218.50 per month under this bill, while his brother, who was wounded on the field of battle, would get $50 or $60 per month.

Mr. EDGE. Would the Senator support an amendment to the bill that would include in proper proportion the noncommissioned officers and the enlisted men?

Mr. KING. We would have to redraft the bill entirely and find out what is the basis of the compensation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator with regard to that matter that if he should offer an amendment regarding noncommissioned officers and enlisted men, it would be of no benefit to them whatsoever. They do not want it because they get more to-day than they would get under this plan, just as second lieutenants in the Air Service, who were badly smashed up in airplane accidents at the front and who are permanently totally disabled to-day, get more to-day under the present law than they would get under the bill now before us.

Mr. EDGE. Yes; I understand that, but in my suggestion I naturally assumed that any amendment would take all that into consideration and to some extent increase the remuneration; and, of course, there could be absolutely no objection to any such an amendment.

Mr. KING. May I answer the question that the Senator submitted to me a moment ago?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that I will support any bill that equalizes the benefits of pensions to be derived from injuries or disabilities incurred in the line of duty.

I will vote for any bill that will give to the boy who was wounded upon the battle field the same compensation and no more for the disabilities which he sustained as would be paid to his brother who happened to be a commissioned officer and who sustained like disabilities. I would not discriminate between the two. I would give the boy who fought in the trenches and was wounded just the same compensation as I would give the captain or the lieutenant or the major who was back of the line or, perhaps, here in Washington doing clerical work, or who was fighting on the battle front.

I am not in favor of any discrimination. It was a democratic war, and the boys who fought in the trenches are entitled to the same compensation as are the officers, many of whom were, of course, upon the battle front; but many of whom never saw the battle front.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. TYSON. I wish to say to the Senator, who was speaking about the second lieutenants of the Air Corps not being benefited by this bill, that under the terms of the bill, unless application shall be made within two years, an officer can not be retired; and therefore if an Air Corps lieutenant is receiving more under the terms of the present law than he would under this bill, he does not have to make application, and therefore would continue to get what he is now receiving.

Mr. BINGHAM. That just emphasizes the unfairness of the whole measure. A flier in the Army permanently totally disabled, with the rank that most fliers had in the Army—and practically all who were commissioned after September 1, 1917, had the rank of second lieutenant—will get no benefit whatsoever from the bill and must not even have the privilege of having his name go on the retired list which it creates, because if he did his compensation would be reduced from $100 or from $150, if to-day it is a case requiring a nurse, to only $93.75.

Mr. President, those who will be benefited by this bill are really very few in number. There are a number of field officers who will be substantially benefited by it and a number of company officers not seriously disabled who will gain very substantial amounts. It is always difficult to speak in the abstract, but when we have concrete cases before us it is easier. Whenever we pass bills granting claims of any amount whatsoever to different persons or when we pass an omnibus pension bill we give to the country the names of the beneficiaries, in order that the people, whose taxes we are expending, may know exactly who is benefited by the legislation. I have before me, Mr. President, the names of all those officers who were rated as permanently disabled at 30 per cent or more, together with the amount they are now receiving, their percentage of disability, and the amount which they would receive under the bill. I should like to have this list printed in the RECORD, without any reference to the nature of their disability, because I esteem their disability a private and personal matter, in which the public is not or ought not to be interested. I ask unanimous consent to have the list printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The list is as follows:

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator state how many names there are in the list which he has secured permission to print in the RECORD?

Mr. BINGHAM. There are about 3,000 names. It will be seen that in that list of 3,000 names quite a number would get no benefit at all from the bill, and will not be likely to accept the privilege of availing themselves of the act. I see on this list name after name of officers who are now getting $100 or $150 a month. If they were second lieutenants they would not be the gainers by coming in under the bill, and if they were first lieutenants and suffered serious disability, so that to-day they are receiving allowance for a nurse, they would not be the gainers by coming in under the bill. It is, however, chiefly a small number of field officers who will gain by the passage of this proposed legislation. The 31,784 enlisted men who are to-day rated as having total permanent disability and who receive from $100 to $150 a month will not be benefited by the passage of the bill at all; but several hundred officers, whose rating is from 30 to 60 or 70 per cent, are going to have their allowance increased five or six times.

Mr. STECK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STECK. Of course, the Senator from Connecticut is correct when he says that a large number of officers who might be affected by the passage of this bill are in the lower grades of first and second lieutenants, and that those officers will not be helped. It would not be to the interest of the second lieutenants to accept the provisions of this bill, and first lieutenants would be benefited but very little. A very large proportion of the three thousand-odd officers on the list that the Senator has just had printed in the RECORD are of the two lower grades. I suppose the Senator is speaking partly in their behalf, as he has already spoken in behalf of the enlisted men. I should like to ask the Senator if he has ever had any complaint from any of the first or second lieutenants with reference to the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr President; I am glad to say that I have not. I think that anyone who would complain against the provisions of the bill because it did not give him as much as it gave somebody else, while it would be very human, would not be doing himself or the country a service.

Mr. STECK. Then, the Senator has taken it upon himself to speak in behalf of these men who do not speak for themselves?

Mr. BINGHAM. We must look at these things not in behalf of any small number of men or number of officers but from the point of view of the Nation at large.

In this list there is one general officer who to-day gets $396 a year, and who by this bill will receive $4,500 a year.

There are 11 colonels in this list who to-day receive an average of $1,052 a year, who under this bill will receive $3,000 a year, or about three times as much as they receive to-day.

There are 29 lieutenant colonels who to-day receive an average of $956 a year, who, if this bill shall be passed, will each receive $2,625, or nearly three times as much.

There are 205 majors who to-day receive an average of $888 a year, who, if this bill passes, will receive $2,250 a year, or two and a half times as much.

In other words, Mr. President, this bill is for the benefit of the favored few. Having myself been one of the favored few, who went into the Army with a commission as a field officer, when I probably did not deserve more than a first lieutenant's commission—in fact, I applied only for a first lieutenant's commission—knowing that I was particularly favored by circumstances, knowing that there were many others who were favored by circumstances, it does not seem to me wise or in accordance with American practice to favor for the rest of their lives those who were temporarily fortunate in their rank during the war.

As a matter of fact, we have drawn up a law for the compensation of disabled veterans which is in effect to-day and which is extremely fair. It is based on the degree of disability which an officer or enlisted man suffered—both are on the same basis—and on the manner in which his wounds or his ailments affect his earning power, according to what he was doing before the war. There are very great differences in this list. A minor difference was brought out a few moments ago in the discussion by the Senator from New Mexico with regard to the difference between a bacteriologist and a chemist both suffering from a similar injury, the one being rated at 29 per cent and the other at 33 per cent.

In order to illustrate these differences and to show how well we do it to-day and how fairly we do it, let me take the ratings for amputation of the lower two-thirds of the leg with regard to different occupations. In the case of an enlisted man or an officer who has lost the lower two-thirds of his leg the rating, if he be a lawyer, is 29 per cent, and under the present law he gets $29 a month. If he be a farmer, it is 55 per cent, or nearly twice as much. If he be a bookkeeper, it is 25 per cent; if he be a mason, it is 55 per cent; if he be a stationary engineer, it is 44 per cent; if his former profession was that of a soldier, his rating is 65 per cent, but if it was that of a physician, it is only 39 per cent. If his occupation was that of a salesman, the rating is 39 per cent; if that of a bellboy, who must use his legs a great deal, it is 55 per cent; if that of a cashier, only 29 per cent.

Mr. President, those ratings have been worked out, after years of study, with great care, so as to do justice to the citizens of the United States who went into the Army and who suffered disability. They have been worked out in the same way in the case of hundreds of occupations and thousands of kinds of disabilities.

This bill introduces an entirely new and un-American theory. The theory of this bill is that an officer should get more because he is an officer, without regard to his previous occupation; without regard, except so far as 30 per cent goes, to the nature of his ailment.

Now, let us consider a case from this particular list which has been so carefully worked out. If a colonel who was wounded had been a lawyer and lost during his service the lower two-thirds of his leg, he would under the bill proposed by the Senator from Tennessee continue to receive $29 a month; but if he were so fortunate as to be a physician he would under the bill of the Senator from Tennessee receive for the rest of his life $250 a month. It seems strange, Mr. President, that any Senator could be willing to vote for a bill whose general principles are such as to make such extraordinarily unfair differences in the compensation. Those who have studied the matter believe that the proper difference between the effect of the disability on a lawyer and on a physician is the difference between 29 and 39, or 10 per cent, but according to the bill of the Senator from Tennessee the difference is that between 29 and 250, or 221 per cent.

It may interest the Senate to have another instance. Let us take the case of a proof reader.

A proof reader who lost his right thumb in the Army gets $21 a month compensation to-day. If he lost his right thumb and index finger he gets $30 a month compensation, or an increase of $9. If that proof reader had been a captain during the war, under this bill, if he had lost his right thumb, he would continue to get $21. If he had lost his right thumb and index finger he would get $125, or an increase of $104 for that additional finger.

The enlisted man gets $9 additional for the loss of that finger if he had been a proof reader. A man who was lucky enough to get to an officers' school and become a captain and lost that additional finger gets a benefit of $104 a month, or $1,248 yearly additional for the rest of his life. A colonel would get $2,652 annually. A corporal would get $108 annually.

Is that the American idea of fair play, Mr. President?

I admit it is the idea in a monarchy. It is the Canadian idea. In Canada disabled veterans are paid exactly in accordance with their rank—a private so much, a corporal a little more, a sergeant a little more, a second lieutenant a little more, a first lieutenant a little more, and so all the way up to major general. In a monarchy there are grades, strata in society and in life; and a man who came into the army as a colonel belonging to a certain grade or stratum in private life, if disabled, receives far more than had he come from that grade of private life which would have let him in as a private and kept him as a private. That, however, is not the American system.

The claim made over and over again on this floor that it is what we do in the Regular Army is not justified at all, because the retired pay of an officer in the Regular Army depends on his length of service and not on the amount of his disability. When he goes into the Army he makes a contract with the Government. His pay increases from year to year as he serves. The amount of his pay depends on the number of years he has been in contractual relations with the Government and on nothing else, and when he is retired his retired pay depends on the number of years he has served his Government, whereas in this bill it does not depend on the length of time served. A man who served only a week is treated the same as the man who had served 2 or 3 or 4 years, or even 30 years. It depends entirely on the extent of his disability and his good fortune in securing a commission.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask that the clerk at the desk may read the very interesting report made in the House of Representatives when this bill came up in the last session. It was made by four veterans of the World War. It is known as the minority report from the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

This is known as the World War emergency officers' retirement bill. If it should become a law it would most unjustly discriminate against all disabled enlisted men and a large part of the disabled emergency officers in favor of a certain class comprising a limited number of disabled emergency officers. It would reward men not according to their disability but according to their rank, thereby violating the very fundamental principles of our American institutions.

For instance, an officer who incurred physical disability in line of duty and has been "or may hereafter be" rated at not less than 30 per cent permanent disability shall be placed upon the retired list at 75 per cent of the salary to which he was entitled at the time of his discharge. What does this mean? It means that an emergency officer with a 30 per cent disability which originated in line of duty shall receive pay for life as follows:

	Per month
Brigadier general	$375.00
Colonel	250.00
Lieutenant colonel	218.75
Major	187.50
Captain	150.00
First lieutenant	125.00
Second lieutenant	93.75

While the enlisted man with a 30 per cent disability will receive $30 a month.

Yet they tell us that the ex-service men are in favor of this measure. That is not true. If every ex-service man in the United States understood what this bill means, we doubt if it would receive the indorsement of 1 service man out of 10.

It even discriminates against an overwhelming majority of the disabled emergency officers themselves. Those who are rated at less than 30 per cent permanent disabled are excluded from a participation in the financial benefits of this measure. They are to receive the same pay as enlisted men with similar disabilities. If a colonel and his enlisted brother were both 30 per cent permanent disabled, the colonel would receive $250 a month, while the enlisted man would receive only $30 a month. But if they were both 29 per cent permanent disabled they would both receive the same compensation, $29 a month.

Not only that, but it discriminates against the sacred dead, who "gave the last full measure of devotion" upon the field of battle or have died since the war closed. Their loved ones who were dependent upon them for support would not receive one dollar's worth of benefit from this unjust legislation. The widows and children of officers who gave their lives in the conflict or who have died since the war closed would draw compensation on the basis of allowances for the dependents of enlisted men.

The disabled emergency officers are being taken care of now along with the enlisted men. They served together, they fought together, they were frequently members of the same families, and where they suffered the same disabilities they should receive the same treatment.

But the advocates of this bill argue that these disabled emergency officers are discriminated against in the retirement of officers of the Regular Army, and ask Congress to pass this measure to favor 1,848 of these emergency officers and to discriminate against 41,496 enlisted men who are disabled to the same degree and 6,618 disabled emergency officers and 171,580 disabled enlisted men whose disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent, in order to correct what they contend is a discrimination in favor of the officers of the Regular Army.

We are not responsible for the present law providing for the retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment. But if we were, and were willing to concede that there is an injustice in the present law, we would not be justified in trying to offset it by passing additional unjust legislation.

We must remember that officers of the Regular Establishment go into the Army for life. They make it their life's work; and in order to secure the class of men necessary to maintain the proper officer personnel in times of peace we must make some provision for taking care of them in case they become disabled.

As was said by a former Secretary of War:

"The privileges of the retired list of the Regular Army constitute a consideration granted by the Government for the consecration of lives to its military service and the volunteering for life for such service in any exigencies that may arise, whether in peace or war. The military relation requires the officer to give up ambitions, which are the rightful portion of every man in the great world outside, and for a measure of compensation which does not exceed what is barely sufficient to maintain himself and family in the status which the military service demands; and the law has said that when he serves a prescribed period of time or has reached a certain age or is disabled by injury or disease incident to the service he must withdraw from active service and give way to a younger man better fitted for the rigors of military life. As the officer has not been trained for a business career or for any career in civil life, he finds himself at the end of his service, certainly in the vast majority of cases, not only without a profession but without a competency."

He also calls attention to the fact that—

"Congress has thus far restricted the privilege of retirement to members of the permanent Military Establishment; that is, to those only who have consecrated their lives to the military service. This is true not alone of the officers but of the enlisted man, who may retire only when he has served a sufficient time to indicate that he has adopted the military service as a life career. To those who have thus pledged their services for life to the Nation, in peace or in war, Congress, as a matter of keeping faith with them, has provided by law that they shall be secure in their calling throughout their lives, and when they have performed what is deemed a life service shall be relieved of some of the active duties of service and be permitted a living pay for the remainder of their lives. This basic principle of our retirement laws is recognized in an opinion rendered June 10, 1898, by Solicitor General Richards and had the approval of Attorney General Griggs. In discussing the applicability of laws relating to the Regular Army to the then existing volunteer forces, the Solicitor General said:

"'Chapter 2 of Title XIV, providing for the retirement of Army officers, clearly has no application to the Volunteer Army, organized for simply temporary service. This chapter creates two lists of Regular Army officers—the active and the retired list—a distinction which does not obtain in the Volunteer Army. When, therefore, section 1222 places a restriction on every "Army officer on the active list," it plainly refers to Regular Army officers. An Army officer on the active list is one not only active but permanently engaged in the military service of the Government. Having chosen the Army for his career, and being actively engaged therein, the statute properly prohibits him from accepting or exercising the functions of a civil office.

"'While an officer of the Volunteer Army may be said to be actively engaged in the military service, he is not permanently so engaged. He is called out to meet an emergency, and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer, he has not selected the military service for a profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects when the war is over to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need nor demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence and on his return resume his former work.'"

This is not a new proposition. The Adjutant General stated in a letter to a Member of Congress on February 25, 1926, that—

"Many bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress at different times authorizing the appointment on the retired list of the Army of those officers who served in the Volunteer Army in the Civil War, but none of them has ever been enacted into law."

Congress refused for 50 years and more to pass a law that would thus discriminate between the officers and enlisted men of the Civil War. On May 9, 1917, Hon. Newton D. Baker, then Secretary of War, in a letter to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee with reference to such a measure, made the following prophetic statement:

"Furthermore, if the bill under consideration were to be enacted into law for the benefit of men who served as volunteer officers of the Civil War, it is reasonably certain that it would be followed by other measures for the benefit of volunteer officers of the war with Spain, of officers belonging to the National Guard who have rendered or are now rendering active Federal service, and of officers of the present war not belonging to the permanent Military Establishment. It would seem that the precedent established by the enactment of such legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of one war should, in common fairness, be followed in time by similar legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of all wars. It can be readily seen that the expense involved in any such legislation would be enormous."

The additional expense of this bill for the first year would be $1,190,052. As time goes on the expense will grow. Men will be asking to have their cases reopened and their disabilities readjudged.

Those whose disabilities shall have increased to 30 per cent will be entitled to be placed on the pension roll along with the others. And we had just as well admit that this is a permanent pension that we are being asked to allow to these disabled emergency officers. The chances are that we will soon be asked to reduce the degree of disability to 20 per cent, then to 10 per cent, and finally to wipe it out altogether, and to ultimately place the ex-officers on a pension status as officers instead of leaving them to be treated in the same manner as enlisted men. The enlisted men outnumber the officers overwhelmingly, and already some of them are asking that they be given the benefits of this retirement act in case it passes, and that they be retired as second lieutenants. Suppose pressure should be brought to bear upon Congress later to wipe out some of the discriminations of this measure by giving the enlisted men the retirement or pension status of second lieutenant. Ultimately the percentage requirement as to their disabilities would disappear. Who can tell what the ultimate expense to this Government such a pension policy would bring?

This bill is just the opening wedge. It is lifting the latch to the floodgates of expenditure, the consequences of which no one can foretell.

We regret very much that we are unable to agree with the majority of the committee that reported this bill out. But in justice to the enlisted men, who are just as patriotic and just as deserving as the officers; in justice to the many thousands of disabled emergency officers whose disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent; in justice to the widows and orphans of those who made the supreme sacrifice; in justice to the taxpayers of the United States, on whose shoulders the burden of these expenditures would rest, we respectfully dissent from the views of the majority and submit that this bill ought not to become a law.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the majority report made just before the minority report the Senator has had read.

Mr. BINGHAM. Would the Senator be willing to have that inserted somewhere else than in the middle of my speech?

Mr. TYSON. Of course, if the Senator objects, I can have it inserted elsewhere. It seems to me that the Senator ought to be willing that both reports should be put in at the same time.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator asks to have it printed as a part of his remarks, when he has the floor, I shall be very glad if he will do so.

Mr. TYSON. If the Senator objects, of course, I can not have it put in.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not object; I simply do not want it put in the middle of my remarks any more than I would welcome a long speech in the middle of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that under the rules the document would be printed in the Appendix, unless there were special request made otherwise.

Mr. TYSON. That being the case, the Senator realizes the argument would never be seen; therefore he denies the right and privilege of having the arguments on the other side appear at a time when they can be made useful and effective.

Mr. BINGHAM. No; I do not object to any argument being printed on the other side at all. I merely desire to have inserted in my speech the arguments against the bill. I shall be very glad if the Senator will have that report printed immediately following my speech.

Never having qualified as an authority on retired officers' legislation, and yet having expressed certain opinions with regard to it and what it means, it occurs to me that those who are interested in studying this subject might be glad to have the opinion of a great Secretary of War, who studied this subject very carefully, and who put his opinions in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation on March 5, 1924. I shall not ask to have the entire letter read, but only that part which I have marked relating to retired officers.

Mr. EDGE. Would not the Senator prefer to have unanimous consent to have it inserted in his speech without reading?

Mr. BINGHAM. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Retired officers of the Regular Army still remain officers. They are a part of the permanent Military Establishment, subject to the Articles of War, and as officers have certain rights, obligations, and privileges. H. R. 6484, although it classes its beneficiaries to be placed upon a retired list, does not purport to make them actual officers of the Government or to revive a status as such from which they have long since been discharged. I believe that this is as it should be. The bill clearly eliminates any suggestions of its beneficiaries being subject to the Articles of War and to the obligations of retired officers. The bill would appear to make its beneficiaries subject to the privileges of retired officers in so far as such privileges can be conferred upon persons who are not officers in fact. Some proponents of H. R. 6484 and some of its beneficiaries may take a contrary view. In order that the Congress, the administering agencies, and the beneficiaries should have a common understanding of the privileges granted, it is believed the privileges to be conferred should be clearly stated in the bill rather than covered, as the bill is now drafted, by language that may be variously interpreted and that may, therefore, lead to dissatisfaction.

The privileges of retired officers of the Regular Army, not dependent solely upon their being officers in fact, are few in number. Those of any consequence are the privilege of wearing the uniform and retaining the title of their rank, the privilege of purchasing supplies at Army sales stores, and the privilege of receiving medical treatment at places where such is available. The first of these privileges is conferred by law and the others by regulation. An enumeration of these privileges in the law, in case you believe they should be conferred, would greatly clarify the matter. Such enumeration would have another decided advantage, i. e., it would avoid linking together, by common privileges, of two distinct classes of individuals. Such a legal alliance of these classes may prove an obstacle to good administration should it be found necessary or desirable at any time to increase or decrease the privileges of either class.

Having covered the two matters in which the War Department is directly concerned in administration, this report might well be closed were it not for the fact that a principle is involved which vitally affects the Military Establishment and the national defense.

In privileges, in compensation, and in their actual status the bill departs from the equality it purports to establish between regular and emergency disabled officers. The difference as to official status has already been pointed out. As an example of the inequality in privileges the emergency officer is to have all the privileges of the regular officer and, in addition, he is to have all the privileges of hospitalization and medical treatment authorized by the Veterans' Bureau. It would appear that medical treatment by the Army would be an unnecessary privilege to extend and might be productive of difficulties that generally ensue from divided responsibility, especially in medical treatment.

In the matter of compensation in general the bill creates a wide discrepancy, which I shall endeavor to explain later. There is also a discrepancy in those cases of helplessness necessitating the constant attendance of a nurse. Under the act of December 18, 1922, the beneficiaries of H. R. 6484 would receive additional compensation not exceeding $5 per month, whereas the retired regular officer receives only his retired pay, no matter what his condition. I do not desire to be understood as opposing any additional privileges and compensation for disabled emergency officers that may be necessary or desirable; but I believe the fact that discriminations are proposed as necessary serve to emphasize the fact that regular and emergency officers are distinct classes, each requiring definite treatment, and that any policy of endeavoring to care for one class by a system designed for another is demonstrated by such discriminatory provisions themselves to be an unwise policy. The disabled emergency officer should have every benefit that the Government can equitably confer, whether this be more or less than the benefits conferred upon retired officers of the Regular Army. Each class should be separately considered upon its merits, taking into account the conditions of service of each. Whatever is necessary should be done in a direct manner and without inviting the consequences of a superficial but not real equality in the relief afforded to each.

The discriminatory treatment of the two classes of personnel becomes more apparent when we turn to the compensatory feature of H. R. 6484. This bill grants retired pay to those beneficiaries between 30 per cent and 100 per cent impaired in earning capacity in their civil occupation. There is no gradation in retired pay between these limits of impairment. Beneficiaries between 10 per cent and 30 per cent impaired are to have all the benefits of the bill except retired pay, and in lieu thereof are to continue to receive compensation graded according to degree of impairment. In contrast with this the compensation and retirement of regular officers as now provided by law is quite different. A Regular Army officer, being committed to a life in the military service and generally having embarked upon such career at an early age, has no civil pursuit or occupation. Recognizing this condition, the Government has made provision for his lifelong continuance in the Military Establishment, passing to an inactive status in his old age or when pronounced no longer capacitated for active service; that is, when found 100 per cent impaired in the active practice of his only profession. A lesser degree of impairment does not, and in my judgment should not, entitle him to be placed upon the inactive (retired) list or to receive retirement pay. Hence we have the discrepancy of a total impairment for further active practice or profession being a requisite for being placed on the inactive list and receiving retirement pay in the regular service, whereas a minimum of 30 per cent impairment is requisite for retired pay and a minimum of only 10 per cent impairment is requisite for being placed upon the retired list in the case of emergency officers. Objection is not made to this discrimination, but it is merely pointed out to illustrate the futility and impracticability of endeavoring to establish an equality that is unattainable due to the inherent conditions which differentiate the two classes of military personnel, permanent and temporary.

Aside from the differing methods by which disability is to be rated, H. R. 6484 would establish another discrimination which may have far-reaching effects. The bill establishes retired pay at the rate of 75 per cent of the active pay received at time of discharge. Such active pay, and therefore retired pay, will, of course, be that of the grade attained under the varying and vagarious incidents of war well known to the members of your committee. Former officers of the same disability, the same length of service, and the same age may receive widely different compensation due solely to difference in their temporary war rank. However, with these differences amoung the beneficiaries themselves I am not concerned except in so far as they arise from the fallacy of attempting to apply a principle applied in the retirement system of the permanent establishment. The general laws provide that a Regular Army officer retired for physical disability receive 75 per cent of the pay of his rank at the time of retirement. But this rank is his permanent rank in the military service attained under the slow process of seniority promotion in peace and war. In decreeing that it should be so Congress has taken cognizance of the rapidity and capriciousness of temporary promotion in war and has eliminated temporary war rank as a basis for both retired rank and pay. To do otherwise would cause retirement pay to be based upon the unavoidable inequalities of opportunity for advancement in war and would depart from a long-standing principle that has been accepted as equitable and just. In effect, retirement pay is now based in reality upon length of service upon which rank depends and which is generally accepted as the only satisfactory standard for all advancement and remuneration in the permanent Military Establishment. Hence H. R. 6484, while purporting to apply the principles of retirement as established for the permanent Military Establishment actually departs from such principles and establishes for one class of personnel a new basis for retired pay. Instead of equality of treatment of regular and temporary disabled officers there will be, under the guise of equality, discriminatory treatment. Certainly such an effect, from a measure which is well known to be based upon a demand for equality of treatment, would be most unfortunate and would fall far short of being a satisfactory and final solution of a difficult problem.

If the compensation of disabled emergency officers is to be a per centum of their active pay, I realize, of course, that it must necessarily be based upon the accidents of rank attained under war conditions—the only rank they have had. But, if this is done, I trust it will be with a clear understanding that it constitutes a departure from a fundamental principle of the retirement system now in effect.

The War Department does not desire to appear to be opposing the granting to disabled emergency officers any relief or benefits to which they are justly entitled. It fully appreciated their desire for both adequate compensation and some form of recognition of their military service as officers. It believes, however, that both the recognition and compensation can be extended without recourse to the retirement system as practiced in the permanent establishment. Some modification of H. R. 6484 clearly stating the privileges to be accorded its beneficiaries and adhering to the present sound principle of compensating disabled personnel according to degree of disability and independently of accidents of war rank appears desirable. In lieu of a percentage of the pay of their rank as proposed in the bill a separate scale of compensation, such as one 40 per cent or more in excess of the present scale for disabled emergency officers would appear to be more sound in theory and practice. As between accidents of rank attained by wartime appointments and promotions on the one hand and degree of disability on the other, the choice of the best basis for compensation appears clear. For the totally disabled a scale as suggested would provide compensation equal to or greater than the retired pay of retired captains and lieutenants of the regular service. But it would confer this compensation without the many disadvantages that I have endeavored to point out arising from an attempt to apply a system that is inapplicable.

H. R. 6484 is drawn to benefit a distinct class. It will, however, establish a practice that may ultimately be applied to the disabled of all wars, past and future. This ultimate extension is a most cogent reason for this first step conforming to a sound policy of general application. It is solely a desire to see action taken in accordance with sound principles, and with no desire to oppose any reasonable relief for our unfortunate disabled officers, that this report has gone to great length in endeavoring to point wherein the principles of retirement as established by law and practiced in the permanent establishment are inapplicable in the relief of temporary personnel.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a few words more and I shall conclude. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] this morning referred to the fact that this is merely to do for the Army emergency officers what has already been done for the Navy and Marine Corps. That is true; but it is only fair to call attention to the fact that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, in his letter to me of February 26, 1927, which was printed on page 4026 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, points out that as to emergency officers rated on a permanent basis of 30 per cent or more, there are in the Marine Corps 16, in the Navy 185, and in the Army 3,050.

Because of the small numbers involved in the Navy and Marine Corps, as well as because of the way in which the legislation was passed without being fully considered, it does not seem to me that the argument that we should do for 3,050 officers in the Army what we have done for 16 officers in the Marine Corps and 185 officers in the Navy is a very strong argument, although I recognize its force.

Mr. President, in conclusion I would like to say that I am opposed to this legislation, although it affects many of my friends, and I have received a great many letters in its favor from many former fellow soldiers. It is extremely difficult to oppose legislation of this sort. It appeals to one's sympathies. But I am opposed to it because I believe, in the first place, it is extremely unfair to the enlisted men who served the same length of time as the officers and who came from the same walks of life as the officers and who are all compensated at present in accordance with their disability and its effect on their former earning power.

I am opposed to it because it is unfair to the second lieutenants who did their duty just as well as those of higher rank, and especially those who, though totally disabled to-day, would not receive one cent in benefit by accepting the terms of the pending bill, but would, in fact, receive less if they accepted its provisions.

I am opposed to it because it does away with the benefits to the widows of veterans and orphans which they now receive under the Veterans' Bureau act.

I am opposed to it because it is un-American. It is based upon a system drawn from a monarchical country, where gradations in rank and in society are recognized as being permanent, instead of being based, as our present legislation is based, on the amount of disability in connection with the earning capacity of the person affected and the way in which his disability affects his earning power; it is based on temporary rank.

I am opposed to it because I believe it is a bad military policy. One of the attractive features by which we induce men to devote their lives to the Regular Army is to offer them the retirement feature as a part of their contract, the equity in it to increase with years of service. Here we say to them, "It matters not how many years of service you have had, if you are willing to go to the colors in time of war with a few weeks of preparation, and are injured, you will receive just as much and your compensation will be just as great as though you had devoted 20 or 30 years to the Army."

The bill is helpful to relatively few. It is unfair to thousands. It establishes a bad precedent. It is unjust. It is un-American.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not care to delay action on the measure, as I am very anxious to have a vote, but I would like to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the debate certain resolutions adopted by the Department of Massachusetts, American Legion, in our annual convention in August last at Fitchburg, Mass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

Whereas the American Legion at each of its national conventions has overwhelmingly voted to have enacted into law legislation for the retirement of emergency Army officers permanently disabled in line of duty during the World War so as to place them on the same footing as to retirement as to the other eight classes of disabled officers who are now on the retired lists; and

Whereas the Department of Massachusetts of the American Legion has previously indorsed the principles of this long-pending legislation; and

Whereas measures similar to the Tyson-Fitzgerald bills of the Sixty-ninth Congress, which would have granted this justice, will be introduced in the Seventieth Congress: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Department of Massachusetts of the American Legion, in convention assembled at the city of Fitchburg, Mass., August 11, 12, and 13, 1927, That we hereby reaffirm our previous action on this legislation and urge its enactment by the Seventieth Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the national convention of the American Legion to be held in Paris, France, September 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23, and that the Massachusetts delegation make every effort to have this resolution adopted by the national convention.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would also like to have printed in the RECORD a history of the bill prepared by Hon.

ROY G. FITZGERALD, of Ohio, which strikingly illustrates how, under the rules of the Senate and the House, a handful of Senators and Representatives can delay and postpone for nine years the enactment of legislation which has during that nine years had almost the unanimous support of both the House and the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

The nine-year history of this legislation in the Congress is in reality the history of a series of efforts on the part of its opponents to kill the legislation in committee. The Legion, and friendly legislators on their part, have endeavored to overcome this form of strategy through obtaining a vote upon the measure on the floor of the Senate and the House.

The opposition of the War Department, and the influence of this opposition upon the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and House, have been the chief obstacles to retirement and the determining factors in the amendments which have modified the original form of the legislation and caused the Legion and the other veteran organizations to indorse the present Tyson and Fitzgerald bills.

During this nine-year struggle in committee each side has given ground. The War Department no longer opposes the legislation officially. This is chiefly due to the Legion's acceptance of certain of the War Department's demands for amendment to the original retirement measure.

Now that the legislation is about to be enacted into law and the nine-year fight for the disabled emergency Army officers won, some opponents now say, "You have modified the form of the original measure; therefore I am opposed to the legislation in its present form." We shall see whether this assertion is backed up by sound reasoning, as the measure cares for the officers who have been severely disabled permanently.

SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS

Straight retirement for disability, such as has been extended to the other eight classes of officers, was the original purpose of the Legion, and legislation was requested in this form from the Congress in 1919. The War Department thereupon began vigorous opposition to this straight retirement measure. On July 17, 1919, the Secretary of War wrote a letter to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, to which the legislation had been referred, expressing the War Department's disapproval of the measure and opposing the retirement under the same conditions as received by officers of the Regular Army. The Military Affairs Committee of the House thereupon refused to report the measure.

The Stevenson bill was then introduced in the House on December 3, 1919. The form of this bill was altered in the hope that it would be referred to a committee other than the House Military Affairs Committee, which was still holding up the original retirement measure.

The Stevenson bill provided compensation for the emergency officers who incurred disabilities that officers of the Regular Army received on being retired for like disabilities. Notwithstanding this change in form, the Stevenson bill was referred to the House Military Affairs Committee.

However, on February 28, 1920, the Military Affairs Committee was discharged on the bill and it was referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House; on March 2, 1920, this committee was discharged and the bill referred to the Ways and Means Committee; and on March 11, 1920, this latter committee was discharged and the bill again referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

The War Department opposition to the legislation continued, notwithstanding the change in the form of the measure. On March 13, 1920, the Secretary of War wrote a letter to the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, estimating that 19,910 emergency officers would come under this bill and receive annual payments of $31,099,420. This preposterous estimate, being contained in an official letter, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee hesitated and deferred action on the bill.

NAVY ACTS INDEPENDENTLY

In the meantime the Legion had been in contact with the Navy Department on the question of the retirement of the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps. More progressive than the Army, the Navy realized the justice of the legislation and its value as sound national-defense policy.

Accordingly, in May, 1920, the Secretary of the Navy wrote a letter to Congress requesting the enactment of legislation to retire the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps and submitted a draft of the amendment he proposed. Congress immediately responded to this request and provided retirement for the disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps in the act approved June 4, 1920. This act of Congress removed the discrimination against these two classes of officers, leaving the disabled emergency Army officers as the only class discriminated against out of the nine classes of officers who fought in the World War.

In the meantime no action was obtained from the House Military Affairs Committee on the retirement measure or from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on the Stevenson bill. As a matter of fact, the House Military Affairs Committee did not report its bill and never has to this day reported a bill affecting the disabled emergency officers.

On January 26, 1921, Mr. STEVENSON introduced a bill slightly amending his former measure, which was also referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House. The committee reported this bill favorably on February 2, 1921. The session was then drawing to a close. No action was obtained on it on the floor of the House, and the measure died a month later with the expiration of the Sixty-sixth Congress on March 4, 1921.

SIXTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS

The Stevenson bill was again introduced in the House and again referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. No hearings were held, and the committee took no action on the measure.

On April 11, 1921, the Johnson bill was introduced in the House and referred to the House Military Affairs Committee. This bill provided retirement as extended to the other eight classes of officers. No hearings were held by the House Military Affairs Committee on this retirement bill, in spite of repeated requests on the part of the veterans.

The Bursum bill was then introduced on May 4, 1921, in the Senate. Like the Johnson bill, it provided retirement as extended to the eight other classes of officers. War Department opposition to the measure continued. This opposition influenced certain members of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, to which the measure was referred. The friends of the legislation on the Senate committee, in order to obtain a favorable report, amended the measure so as to meet the chief points of opposition raised by the War Department in the two years it had fought the legislation.

THE AMENDED BURSUM BILL

Under the straight retirement measure—accorded the other eight classes of officers—a disabled officer is examined by a board of Regular Army officers, some of whose members must be regular medical officers. If the board finds that the officer's disability has unfitted him for active duty with troops in the field, the board recommends his retirement for life at three-fourths of the pay and allowances he is then receiving, and he is placed on the regular retired list for life.

Under the Bursum bill as reported by the Senate Military Affairs Committee on July 11, 1921, the following amendments were made to meet the War Department's opposition:

First. Examination for retirement would be made by civilian medical officers of the Veterans' Bureau instead of by a Regular Army retiring board.

Second. Eligibility to retirement was increased to 30 per cent permanent disability instead of ability to perform active duty with troops in the field.

Third. The Veterans' Bureau was required to pay the emergency officers retired in this manner instead of the War Department.

BURSUM BILL REPORTED

As amended in this form, the Senate Military Affairs Committee reported the Bursum bill favorably to the Senate on July 11, 1921, the first time a Military Affairs Committee had reported the legislation.

BURSUM BILL PASSES SENATE

In spite of the amendments, opposition from the War Department continued, and friends of the measure were unable to bring it to a vote in the Senate until February 21, 1922, when it passed the upper body 50 to 14 and was forwarded to the House, where it was immediately referred to the House Military Affairs Committee.

HOUSE COMMITTEE STILL WITHHOLDS APPROVAL

Following a long series of efforts on the part of the Legion, the House Military Affairs Committee finally granted hearings on the Bursum bill. At these hearings the case of the disabled officers was presented fully. More than a score of them appeared and exhibited their battle wounds as mute advocates for the legislation. Every recognized veterans' organization appeared in behalf of the measure.

In spite of the efforts of the friends of the bill, War Department influence still prevailed. The House Military Affairs Committee held up the bill for more than a year, declining to report it out. A petition signed by 235 Members of the House—containing more than a majority of each party in the lower body—was finally presented to the House Military Affairs Committee requesting the report of the measure. This the committee declined to do, and the bill died with the expiration of the Sixty-seventh Congress in March, 1923.

CONFERENCE OF VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS

During the summer recess of 1923 the veterans' organizations were faced with the following problem: The legislation had been actively pushed for four years, but in all that time the Military Affairs Committee of the House had refused to report a bill and the Senate Military Affairs Committee had declined to report any measure which did not conform to the chief War Department objections.

The question to be decided, therefore, was, Shall straight retirement legislation be pushed—which could not be gotten out of the Military Affairs Committees—or legislation conforming to the War Department objections, which could at least be gotten out of the Senate Military Affairs Committee?

Accordingly a conference was called in the city of Washington during the summer of 1923, attended by representatives of all reputable World War veterans' organizations, to consider the form of the legislation to introduce in the coming Congress. This conference was attended by duly accredited representatives of the American Legion, the National Guard Association, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the Disabled Emergency Officers of the World War, and the Military Order of the World War, and a designated representative of the General Staff of the Army.

THE BILL WAS AGREED UPON

Sessions were held for three days. The form of the legislation was discussed at length. The representatives of the veterans' organizations present finally agreed unanimously to push the measure in the form it had passed the Senate in order to meet the major objections of the War Department, for no progress could be made unless the Senate Military Affairs Committee would report the measure.

It was recommended that the permanent disability rating for which retirement should be granted be reduced from 30 per cent to 20 per cent. At the request of the General Staff representative it was further agreed that the retired list should be kept in the Veterans' Bureau, although it should also be published in the Army Register. In other respects the bill agreed upon by the conference was substantially the same as the Bursum bill in the form it had passed the Senate.

PASSES THE SENATE AGAIN

This new bill was prepared and officially indorsed by the veterans' organizations and introduced in the next Congress, where it was again considered by the Senate Military Affairs Committee. That committee reported it favorably, but put back the former permanent disability rating for eligibility to 30 per cent. This provision was retained when the bill passed the Senate February 20, 1925, 63 to 14, and forwarded to the House.

NEW HOUSE COMMITTEE REPORTS BILL

In the meantime, at the request of the Legion, the House had created the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. They asked that the Bursum bill be referred to this committee instead of the unfriendly House Military Affairs Committee, and the House accordingly agreed. This friendly veterans' committee had already favorably reported the Lineberger bill, similar to the Bursum bill, which was being held up in the Rules Committee of the House.

The House Veterans' Committee immediately reported the Bursum bill so that it would displace the Lineberger bill. A hearing was granted by the Rules Committee of the House on the question of granting a rule to allow the House to vote upon the bill which had already passed the Senate. The Rules Committee failed to grant the desired rule.

KILLED BY THE LEADERS

Efforts were made during the last six days of the session to obtain recognition from the Speaker so that the measure might be voted upon in the House under suspension of the rules. The Speaker refused to grant the recognition, and the measure again died, after being passed by the Senate, with the expiration of the Sixty-eighth Congress, March 4, 1925.

FIRST SESSION SIXTY-NINTH CONGRESS

At the close of the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress the situation on the Tyson and Fitzgerald bills was as follows:

The Fitzgerald bill (H. R. 4548) had been introduced in the House of Representatives December 9, 1925, by ROY G. FITZGERALD, legionnaire, of Dayton, Ohio, Representative from the third congressional district of that State. Hearings were thereupon held by a subcommittee of the World War Veterans' Committee of the House, as follows: Representative FITZGERALD, chairman; Representative THADDEUS C. SWEET, of Phoenix, N. Y.; and Representative LAMAR JEFFERS, legionnaire, of Anniston, Ala. Following a favorable report from the subcommittee to the Veterans' Committee, that committee favorably reported the bill on March 13, 1926 (Rept. No. 536), the measure being immediately placed upon the Union Calendar of the House. A minority report opposing the measure was signed by Representative JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi; Representative BIRD J. VINCENT, of Michigan; Representative JACOB B. MILLIGAN, of Missouri; and Representative J. S. Montgomery, of Oklahoma, all members of the Legion.

On March 29, 1926, Chairman ROYAL C. JOHNSON, legionnaire, of South Dakota, introduced House Resolution 193, to provide a rule for consideration by the House of the Fitzgerald bill under the five-minute rule, the debate to continue for not to exceed five hours. The resolution was referred to the House Rules Committee. Two hearings were held upon House Resolution 193 by the House Rules Committee, May 4, 1926, and June 22, 1926, at the latter hearing ROBERT G. SIMMONS, of Nebraska; BIRD J. VINCENT, of Michigan; JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi; and RALPH E. UPDIKE, of Indiana, all legionnaires, arguing against a report on the measure. The session adjourned July 3, 1926, without action on the part of the Rules Committee, the bill still remaining upon the Union Calendar of the House.

The Tyson bill, S. 3027, similar to the Fitzgerald bill, was introduced in the Senate February 1 by Senator LAWRENCE D. TYSON, legionnaire, of Knoxville, Tenn. The measure was immediately referred to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, which held hearings upon the measure on March 5, 1926. On March 25 the Tyson bill was favorably reported to the Senate by this committee, Report No. 483, and the bill placed upon the Senate calendar. Although Senator TYSON made repeated efforts, he was unable to obtain Senate consideration of the measure, and the session ended with the Tyson bill being Order No. 486 under Rule VIII of the General Orders of the Senate, standing sixth on the list of orders.

SECOND SESSION SIXTY-NINTH CONGRESS

The problem confronting final enactment of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill at the short session, Sixty-ninth Congress, was the time element involved, and the ability of opponents to turn this situation to their advantage through blocking its consideration by parliamentary tactics.

The Senate procedure under leadership of Senator TYSON consisted in the straight attack, pushing the measure at all times, and endeavoring to obtain a vote wherever possible.

The House procedure differed in that the consent of the leaders in control of the legislative program there had to be won if a House vote was to be obtained. These steps consisted in the following:

First. Obtaining a rule from the House Rules Committee which would designate the conditions under which a vote would be had.

Second. Favorable action by the House steering committee on this rule, which would recommend preferred status on the measure to the majority leader and the Speaker.

Third. Decision on the part of the majority leader upon a definite time for House consideration of the bill, and lacking this—

Fourth. Consent of the Speaker to recognize the bill's spokesman so that it might be brought up and considered under suspension of the rules.

THE SENATE FIGHT

Senator TYSON began aggressive action as soon as the Congress convened in December, 1926. At that stage of the session the Tyson bill could be reached only on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, although during the morning hour of the Senate, which under the Senate rules follows an adjournment of the upper body, the motion could be made that the bill be considered by the Senate, notwithstanding the lack of unanimous consent. Under these circumstances the Senate would vote on the question of considering the measure during the remainder of the morning hour and debate upon the bill would be had. Under the rules the morning hour of the Senate lasts for two hours, but as the Senate usually recesses instead of adjourning, the morning hour does not occur daily—in fact, occurs only about twice a week and lasts only two hours.

When consideration is obtained on a measure through the method just outlined, a vote upon its passage must be had before the end of the morning hour if final action on the bill is to be obtained. The unfinished business of the Senate automatically comes up for consideration at the expiration of the morning hour, and consideration of the unfinished business can only be laid aside through unanimous consent.

As the short session progressed the Senate situation disclosed that the extended debate upon the measure continually indulged in by opponents was for the purpose of delaying its consideration, and was not an endeavor to bring further and necessary information to light on the merits of the bill. Senator TYSON accordingly decided that he would not speak further upon the measure after his opening statement in its behalf had been completed, and that he would request the Senate friends of the measure to follow a similar procedure. This method left it up to the opponents to consume whatever time existed for the bill's consideration. This they did continually, repeating their timeworn, threadbare arguments against the measure, and when running out of these, with which the Senate had grown familiar during the seven years in which the measure had been considered, resorted to other delaying tactics, such as demanding roll calls, to consume time, and thus block a Senate vote.

An analysis of the Senate record for the session in this connection shows the following:

December 17, 1926: Tyson bill automatically came before the Senate on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Consideration objected to by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, thus preventing a vote.

January 8, 1927: Consideration under unanimous consent objected to by Senator BINGHAM, of Connecticut, and Senator KING, of Utah. Senator TYSON thereupon moved that, notwithstanding the objection, the bill be considered, the Chair ruling that such a motion was in order. Senator BINGHAM then announced that he would appeal from the ruling of the Chair. After much debate had been consumed upon this latter motion, it was apparent that no further time during the morning hour existed for consideration of the measure, and both motions were thereupon withdrawn.

January 11, 1927: Senator TYSON during the morning hour moved consideration of the Tyson bill, Senator BINGHAM thereupon demanding a quorum call, which consumed considerable time. Senator TYSON then delivered a masterful address in behalf of the measure, opponents consuming time by interruptions and questioning, including another demand for a quorum call by Senator BINGHAM a few minutes before 2 o'clock, at which time the morning hour expired, before a vote could be had upon the measure.

January 17, 1927: Senator TYSON requested unanimous consent for consideration of the bill, to which Senator BINGHAM objected. Senator TYSON then moved that consideration be had, the objection notwithstanding, but after considerable debate this motion was withdrawn when the approaching end of the morning hour made it apparent that a vote could not be had.

January 31, 1927: Senator TYSON requested unanimous consent for the bill's consideration, Senator KING objecting. Senator TYSON then moved that consideration be had notwithstanding. After considerable debate the Vice President ruled that this motion was out of order on Monday.

February 7, 1927: At a special night session of the Senate, held to consider unobjected bills on the Senate calendar, Senator TYSON requested unanimous consent for the bill's consideration, Senator REED of Pennsylvania objecting. Senator TYSON then moved that the bill be considered, the objection notwithstanding. A vote was taken upon this question and the Senate decided 44 to 4 that the bill be immediately considered. Senator Wadsworth then spoke against the measure for considerable time, followed by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, who read into the RECORD a long letter written two years prior—which he had read into the RECORD at that time—from an alleged official of a so-called veterans' organization opposing the measure. It was subsequently shown that the author of this letter had since been sentenced to serve three months in the city jail of Los Angeles after being convicted of having solicited funds from the public for a defunct veterans' aid organization.

This was a remarkable situation. Only one opposing letter could be produced in two years, and that letter from a man sentenced to jail in connection with veterans' affairs! Senators friendly to the measure exerted every effort to obtain a vote at this time, but the opponents continued their delaying tactics and the hour of adjournment was finally reached with the opponents still talking, a vote upon the measure thereby again being prevented.

February 22, 1927: At a special night session held for consideration of the veterans' loan bill, Senator TYSON moved to attach the Tyson bill as an amendment to this measure. Senator REED of Pennsylvania filibustered against this action. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the special night session would adjourn at 11 p. m. At 10.55 p. m. Senator TYSON withdrew his amendment. Senator REED, however, continued his filibuster and prevented a vote upon the veterans' loan bill that night.

February 23, 1927: Unanimous-consent agreement was reached to consider the Tyson bill from 3 to 4 p. m. on February 24. Senator TYSON immediately circulated a cloture petition so as to obtain a vote upon cloture for the bill at the hour set aside for its consideration.

February 24, 1927: Senator TYSON presented his cloture petition. Adoption of this by the Senate required two-thirds vote. Under the rules the vote was to come without further debate upon February 26.

February 26, 1927: Cloture upon the Tyson bill was lost by a vote of 51 to 36. It lacked 7 votes necessary for the number to invoke cloture.

* * * * * * *

REASON FOR CLOTURE DEFEAT

The foregoing analysis shows that one of the reasons for the failure to obtain the two-thirds majority necessary for cloture was due to the invariable rule followed by nine Senate friends of the measure, who vote against cloture under all circumstances, regardless of their personal attitudes toward the measures involved. While the favorable votes of these nine friends would have won the victory, the primary cause for defeat was the surprise defection of the 11 Senators who have voted favorably heretofore on the passage of the measure and who in addition were not opposed to the principle of cloture, but have, on the contrary, voted in favor of cloture on other measures during the year.

THE HOUSE FIGHT

As pointed out, a different set of circumstances confronted the Fitzgerald bill in the House. The fight in the Senate had been for the most part in the open. The fight in the House, however, had been conducted under cover. A whispering campaign consisting of cloakroom admonitions and conferences, designed to undermine the bill's strength in the House, was conducted throughout the session with unremitting energy and vigor. The primary object of this campaign was to intimidate the leaders in control of the legislative machinery so that they would decline to allow a vote upon the measure. Failing this, the whisperers hoped to undermine the actual House strength of the bill so that in the event the leaders allowed a vote, which seemed probable, that the actual support of the measure would be weakened.

WHISPERING STRATEGY

The strategy of the whisperers consisted in the threat of proposing double-edged amendments from the floor of a highly confusing character which, if adopted, might thwart the purpose of the legislation. They were primarily designed to place Members of the House in an embarrassing position. It was the intention of the whisperers to place the Congressmen in the predicament where a favorable vote on their amendments would be embarrassing, as well as an unfavorable vote. This strategy was designed to prevent pressure by Congressmen on the House leaders to force a vote on the bill. While the whisperers did not succeed in alienating many votes through this cloakroom attack, it has been claimed that they caused a number of its supposed friends to weaken in their desire for a roll-call vote on the measure.

The chief of the double-edged amendments through which the whisperers hoped to embarrass the Congressmen and confuse the issue before the House was to propose that the bill be amended to grant a disability rating of total permanent to all enlisted veterans how rated as permanently disabled more than 30 per cent. The object of such an amendment is clear. It is a continuation of the effort which certain Congressmen have been exerting to alienate the sympathy of the former enlisted men from the former officers, and to create a feeling among the Congressmen that a vote against such an amendment would immediately bring down the wrath of all former enlisted men, who outnumbered the former officers 20 to 1.

The fact that such a proposal—30 per cent permanent disability to be made the equivalent of 100 per cent permanent disability—has never been proposed by any veterans' organization and has never been considered by any committee of the House or the Senate, so that its cost, its effect, or the necessity for its enactment are absolutely unknown, has not so far deterred the whisperers from their announced intention of forcing a vote upon their proposal.

It is unnecessary to point out that the enactment of such an amendment might overturn the entire structure of our carefully developed Veterans' Bureau laws for the relief of the disabled, and that the Legion itself could not properly take a stand for or against such a proposal without a thorough study concerning its probable necessity, effect, and cost.

SNELL GOOD AS HIS WORD

In spite of this whispering campaign, the Members of the House steering committee and the House Rules Committee finally concluded that the Fitzgerald bill was just in principle, and that the House should not further be denied its right to register its will upon it. Early in the session Chairman SNELL, of the House Rules Committee, stated that his committee would report a rule providing consideration of the measure, following the disposition of the annual appropriation bills. Chairman SNELL was as good as his word. On February 15 the House Rules Committee voted to report the rule on the Fitzgerald bill, and House Resolution 427, in compliance with this, was reported to the House on February 16 from the House Committee on Rules. This resolution provided that general debate confined to the bill should not exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing it. That, following this, the bill should be open to amendment under the five-minute rule, and that when the question of amendment had been disposed of, that the previous question should be considered as ordered, and a vote be had upon the passage of the measure.

It should be noted that this was the first time in the nine-year fight for this measure that a rule for its consideration had been granted by the House Rules Committee.

Action on the Fitzgerald bill was then deferred awaiting the Senate action on the Tyson bill, the House leaders having taken the attitude that it would be useless for the House to act upon the Fitzgerald bill unless the Senate passed the Tyson bill, the House leaders assuming that the Fitzgerald bill could be acted upon without notice at any time up until adjournment of the session.

The Senate filibuster against the Tyson bill meanwhile continued. Then two days prior to the date set for adjournment, another Senate filibuster was on in full swing, which continued to adjournment and prevented Senate passage of all additional legislation.

Friends of the measure, nevertheless, desired the House to register its attitude upon the Fitzgerald bill. Representative FITZGERALD conveyed this information to the House leaders, which resulted in the meeting of the House steering committee. This body, after considerable discussion, recommended that the House be allowed to consider the Fitzgerald bill that night, as adjournment was scheduled for noon the next day. Unfortunately, a House filibuster developed at the night session against the immigration bill, then under consideration, and this debate was unduly prolonged. The only hope then remaining was to obtain recognition from Speaker LONGWORTH for House consideration of the measure under suspension of the rules. Mr. LONGWORTH declined to grant this. Representative TILSON, of Connecticut, the majority leader, thereupon asked unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 9.30 the next morning. Mr. FITZGERALD thereupon objected, his plan being to insist upon the House continuing in session until action on his bill was had. However, at this point, Chairman SNELL, of the Rules Committee, presented a privileged report from the Rules Committee, House Resolution 455, which provided that immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it should be in order to move that the House stand in recess.

Mr. SNELL moved the previous question on the adoption of the rule, the previous question was ordered and the resolution agreed to, and the House thereupon stood in recess until 9.30 the next morning, to adjourn at noon on that day without transacting further business.

In this manner was the retirement legislation killed during the short session.

THE FIGHT GREW MORE BITTER

Friends of the retirement bill should reflect that the fight for this meritorious measure became more intense as time went on. Its opponents were few in number but great was the power of obstruction. The chief weapon lay in the rules of the Senate and the House, which enabled a vote to be prevented by parliamentary tactics. To this was added the whispering campaign and the threatened amendments designed to confuse the issue and embarrass those who would vote upon them.

JUSTICE WILL BE GRANTED SURVIVING DISABLED OFFICERS

More than 123 of our disabled emergency Army officers have died during the past year, died while their opponents filibustered and whispered against their relief legislation. The united strength of the Legion is back of this measure—a strength which opponents have failed to divide—and justice to the disabled officers will be written into the law of the land.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] I ask that there may be printed at this point in the RECORD the majority report of the committee to which he referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The majority report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 115, Seventieth Congress, first session]

RETIREMENT OF EMERGENCY OFFICERS

Mr. TYSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report [to accompany S. 777]:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers and former officers of the World War, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill has the approval of the War Department, as will appear by the letter attached hereto, which is made a part of this report.

Your committee held extensive hearings upon this measure at previous sessions and has heretofore favorably reported this legislation three times to the Senate. For these reasons your committee considered further hearings unnecessary in favorably reporting the bill for the fourth time. The Senate has twice passed this measure—in 1922 and 1925—and it has been pending before the Senate in its present form since July, 1921.

There were nine classes of officers who fought in the World War. These were the regular, provisional, and emergency officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Eight of these nine classes of officers have been retired by the Congress for wounds and disabilities resulting from their World War services.

The only officers for whom the Congress has failed to provide retirement are the disabled emergency Army officers. The enactment of this bill therefore will relieve the discrimination which exists against them.

From the Revolutionary War to 1861—more than one-half the period of our existence as a Nation—there was no retirement, either longevity or disability, for the members of our military forces. During this long period the pension system alone recompensed the disabled officers and enlisted men of our Regular and Volunteer forces.

These disability pensions were graduated according to the rank and pay of the disabled officers and enlisted men. No distinction or discrimination existed between the Regular and Volunteer forces. The disabled captain of the Regular Army received exactly the same pension as the disabled captain of Volunteers. The private of Volunteers the same as the Regular Army private.

Similar disability pension laws—providing payment for rank—are still on the books to-day.

After retirement had been inaugurated for Regular officers in 1861, other enactments were made by the Congress, until eight of the nine classes of the officers of our military and naval forces had been provided for in this manner. The disabled emergency naval and Marine Corps officers were the last to receive the benefits of retirement, it having been granted through the act of June 4, 1920.

Enlisted men of the Regular Army were granted longevity retirement in 1885. They have never been accorded retirement for disability. When disabled, they are still to-day placed upon the pension rolls.

The Congress has continued its established policy of retiring emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps by enacting in 1922, 1923, 1924, and 1925, private laws providing retirement for naval and Marine Corps officers who had not availed themselves of the benefits of the act of June 4, 1920.

The congressional policy of retiring our disabled officers is therefore well established. But there are other impelling reasons which should cause the Congress to retire the disabled emergency Army officers.

The selective service act of May, 1917, provided in section 10:

"That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for, other than the Regular Army, shall be in all respects upon the same footings as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army."

And it has been held (in the case of Yates v. United States, 25 Court of Claims, 296) that:

"They [retired officers] are in the nature of pensioners, the compensation and pay given them constituting a form of pension."

And in the Digest of Opinions of the Judge Advocate General, in the edition of 1901, occurs the following:

"They [retired officers] are in fact pensioners and the compensation and pay given them constitutes a form of pension. They exercise no function and receive no emoluments of office, but are pensioned for past faithful service or disabilities contracted in line of duty."

The selective service act was further amplified by General Orders, No. 75, of the War Department, August 17, 1918, which read in part as follows:

"This country has but one Army, the United States Army. It includes all land forces in the services of the United States. These forces, however raised, lose their identity in that of the United States Army. Distinctive appellations such as Regular Army, Reserve Corps, National Guard, and National Army heretofore employed in the administration and command will be discontinued and the single term 'United States Army' will be exclusively used. Orders having reference to the United States Army as divided into separate and component forces of distinct origin, or assuming or contemplating such a division, are to that extent revoked."

Thus by the terms of the selective service act the contractual rights of the emergency officers were based upon those of the Regular Army officers. This in addition to the fact that the disabled emergency Army officers are entitled to the same consideration—as a matter of right—which the Congress has extended to the emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps.

There was no distinction between emergency and Regular Army officers on the battle field. There should be none now.

That the emergency Army officers, who led their men in the most desperate fighting the Nation has ever known, took their leadership seriously, is attested by War Department statistics which show that their battle deaths were 54 per cent greater than those of the men who served under hem. A further analysis of records show that 93 per cent of the Army officers killed in action were emergency Army officers, the remaining 7 per cent having come from the regular forces.

It has been contended by the few opponents of this measure that to retire the emergency officer is a discrimination against the enlisted man. We do not subscribe to that view.

There were more than 600,000 sailors and marines in our World War forces. Their disabled emergency officers have now been retired nearly eight years, yet no protest has been made by these enlisted men against this retirement.

No objection to this legislation emanates from the former enlisted men of the Army, or their organizations. The American Legion with three-quarters of a million members—more than 90 per cent of whom served in the ranks—has ten times gone on record in favor of the principles of this legislation; the Disabled American Veterans, composed exclusively of those disabled in World War service, 90 per cent of whom were enlisted, has seven times done likewise. No reputable veterans' organization has ever opposed this measure, nor do the veterans themselves believe that it discriminates against the disabled enlisted man.

There has never been a disability retirement provision for enlisted men in the regular service. The disabled emergency enlisted man realizes that the compensation now drawn by him is more than he would draw if this act were made applicable to him.

The officers who would be benefited by this legislation are, on the average, 12 to 15 years older than the men who fought under them. They now average about 48 years of age. The emergency officer because of his greater age, had assumed responsibilities prior to his entrance into the service that had not been assumed by the younger enlisted man. These men were, in a majority of cases, of the proven experience in civil life which justified their being commissioned to serve in time of war. The high standard by which they were chosen is revealed in the following extract from War Department memorandum of June 4, 1917, on the selection of candidates for commission:

"Since the special object of these (training) camps is to train a body of men fitted to fill the more responsible positions of command in the new armies, every effort will be made to select men of exceptional character and proved ability in their various occupations. While it is desired to give full opportunity for all eligible citizens to apply, no man need make application whose record is not in all respects above reproach and who does not possess the fundamental characteristics necessary to inspire respect and confidence."

It should be pointed out, then, that these men did not "happen" to receive commissions but earned them by meeting the rigid requirements of the training camps, or, as in the case of those commissioned from the National Guard, who had through long years of training prepared themselves at their own time and expense and were qualified to serve as officers in a national crisis.

In truth, the majority of Regular Army officers now receiving the benefits of the present retirement law because of battle casualties in the late war, are officers with the same training and identical preparation as the emergency officers, few of them being graduates of the Military Academy. On the contrary, they attended the same training camps from which the emergency officers were commissioned after the same period of training, under the same officers, and in the same subjects.

Under the provisions of the national defense act, any major emergency will be met by the aid of the National Guard and the Reserve Corps, and as a national policy it should be assured to the officers of these components of our Army, that for disabilities incurred by them in their service, they will be accorded the same consideration given provisional and regular officers suffering like disabilities under like circumstances, engaged in meeting the same emergency. Fairness requires it, justice demands it, and the esprit de corps of future armies will be insured by it.

The bill provides retirement pay of 75 per cent of the compensation paid at time of discharge from active service to emergency Army officers who incurred permanent disability of 30 per cent or more as a result of their service during the World War.

It is believed that this degree of disability in the keen competition of civil life, is on the average, the equivalent of the "incapacitated for active service," which is the basis of retiring officers from the Regular Establishment on account of disability.

The bill gives to the disabled emergency Army officers the privileges of those now on the retired list; that is, to use the title of their rank, to wear the uniform, to medical treatment at Army hospitals, to purchase supplies at Army sales stores, etc.

It has been advanced that this legislation fails to provide for the widows and children of emergency officers who gave their lives in conflict or who have died since the war. The existing law which cares for these dependents is in nowise changed by this act. Dependents of emergency officers killed in the war have always received the same compensation as the dependents of officers of the regular forces who were killed in the war.

The number of disabled emergency Army officers to be benefited by this proposed act, together with its costs, are shown in the appended letter and table from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, dated January 19, 1928, which are made a part of this report.

The bill provides that the act be administered by the Veterans' Bureau, which has the medical records of the beneficiaries. The bureau will likewise be charged with the funds, relieving the War Department in this connection. Application for retirement shall be made within one year from the approval of this act. These provisions remove objections to the legislation, which prior to their inclusion in the measure, the War Department did not favor.

A list will be furnished for and published in the Official Army Register, to which no objection is made.

JANUARY 21, 1928.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR REED: In compliance with your request of January 9, 1928, I am pleased to submit the following report on S. 777.

The subject of the proposed legislation is "A bill making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War."

Under existing law the regular officer is granted the rights of retirement on account of physical disabilities incurred in line of duty, whereas the emergency officer must look, if so disabled, to the relief afforded by the war risk insurance act as amended.

S. 777 is identical in wording with S. 3027 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, on which I made a report to the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, under date of March 4, 1926. The War Department's attitude on this legislation remains as expressed in that letter.

In my letter of March 4, 1926, I pointed out that the principal administrative obections which the War Department has had in the past to similar bills have been remedied in the present bill, and that there were, therefore, apparently only two features of the bill which directly concern the War Department.

These features, as expressed in S. 777, are as follows:

1. On page 2, lines 10, 11, 12, and 13, it is provided that officers carried on the emergency officers' retired list of the Army "shall be entitled to the same privileges as are now or may hereafter be provided for by law or regulations for officers of the Regular Army who have been retired for physical disability incurred in line of duty." The same language occurs on page 3, lines 19, 20, 21, and 22.

I would suggest that the privileges it is proposed to grant be stated more specifically in the bill, in order that there may be no misunderstanding in the future as to the intent of Congress. That such misunderstandings may occur is evidenced by a consideration of the following status of an officer on the Regular Army retired list:

Upon retirement the retired officer merely passes to a new status in the Military Establishment. He passes to an inactive status but continues to hold office and the rank incident thereto. He is subject to such military service as he is capable of, subject to laws limiting the offices he may hold, and continues subject to the Articles of War and regulations governing retired officers. He may engage in civil pursuits, always subject to interruption in time of emergency or in case of an infraction of the regulations to which he is subject. Being an officer of the Army, he continues entitled to medical treatment, if at a place where such treatment is available by the personnel or facilities maintained by appropriations for the Regular Army. He may also continue to make purchases from Government stores maintained for the Regular Army.

2. On page 3, lines 22 and 23, it is provided "that the retired list created by this act shall be published annually in the Army Register."

While I feel that it would be better administration to have the Veterans' Bureau charged with all administrative acts, the War Department would be glad to do this if Congress so desires. In case it should be deemed best that the War Department publish the list, I would suggest that the bill specifically provide that the Veterans' Bureau be charged with the responsibility for preparation and maintenance of the list and submission of the same annually to the War Department for publication.

In general, any such relief measure should conform to our traditional policies; its administration should be in accord with sound business principles and the benefits conferred should be equitable. The determination of whether these policies are followed, and the cost, the extent to which and the manner in which relief or benefits to which they may be entitled are granted to disabled emergency officers or enlisted men, is a matter to be determined by the Congress.

If any additional information from the War Department is desired, I shall be pleased to furnish it.

If the Committee on Military Affairs wishes to have hearings upon the proposed legislation, the following-named officer is designated to appear before your committee: Lieut. Col. A. J. Booth, The Adjutant General's Department.

The proposed legislation has been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advises that it is in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
Washington, January 19, 1928.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR REED: Reference is made to your letter transmitting copy of S. 777, "A bill making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War," and requesting a report as to the merits thereof. This bill is substantially the same as S. 33, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session. In this connection attention is invited to letters to Hon. Holm O. Bursum, United States Senate, on February 20, 1924, and March 19, 1924, in connection with S. 33, and to letter addressed to the chairman Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, House of Representatives, on March 1, 1924, copies of which are inclosed.

The committee is advised that according to a recent study made in connection with this legislation it is estimated that there are at present 3,030 ex-emergency officers of the World War who are permanently disabled to a degree of 30 per cent or more and who are now receiving compensation totaling $216,436 monthly. The cost of retiring these men at 75 per cent of their pay rate would be $388,137.50 per month, or $4,657,650 annually, the total increased annual cost being $2,060,418. This statement does not include 960 officers who are now drawing compensation of $50 per month under statutory awards for arrested tuberculosis. These cases, if rerated under the schedule of disability ratings and found to be actually disabled to a degree of 30 per cent or more, would increase the cost approximately $118,931.50 per month, or $1,427,178 per annum.

Were the bill amended to provide for the retirement of disabled emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, as well as those of the Army, it is estimated that the total number of officers affected would be raised to 3,223, the monthly payment of compensation for that number now being $231,909, and that the cost of retiring this total number at 75 per cent of their pay rate would be $411,593.75 monthly, or an annual cost of $4,939,125, an increased annual cost of $2,155,137.

A copy of this letter is inclosed for your use.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WOOD, Mr. WASON, and Mr. CULLEN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the last annual report of the Moderation League (Inc.).

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

A NATIONAL SURVEY OF CONDITIONS UNDER PROHIBITION

The Moderation League has continued for a third year its national survey of conditions under prohibition.

The police departments of 602 places have supplied their figures of arrests for intoxication for the three years, 1924 to 1926; 534 departments for the seven years, 1920 to 1926; and 403 departments for the 13 years, 1914 to 1926.

The most significant things disclosed by this year's survey are:

1. Drunkenness increased almost as fast in 1926 as it did in 1925, and somewhat faster than it did in 1924. In the 602 places reporting, arrests for drunkenness increased from 650,961 in 1924 to 687,812 in 1925, and 711,889 in 1926.

2. In the 534 places arrests for drunkenness in 1926 increased 136 per cent above 1920, the first year of national prohibition.

3. In the 403 places reporting from 1914 to 1926, arrests for drunkenness in 1926 were higher than in any previous year, save only the war-boom peak of 1916. The 1916 peak was 563,792 arrests for drunkenness, and 1926 almost reached it, being 559,074.

4. Conditions in the former so-called "dry" States are very much worse to-day, compared with 1914, than are conditions in the so-called "wet" States. In the dry States the number of arrests for drunkenness went up rather sharply in 1926 and exceeded any year heretofore, whereas in the former wet States 1926 slightly exceeded the 1914 level, but did not quite reach the 1916–17 peak.

The figures for 1914 to 1926 reward analysis, inasmuch as they show both the preprohibition and postprohibition level. During 1914 and 1915, before the war boom got under way, drunkenness remained practically stationary.

During 1916 and 1917, war-boom years, there was a very perceptible increase, following the known rule that other things being equal, drunkenness increases with good times and decreases with hard times.

In 1918 and 1919 emergency war-time restrictions on alcoholic beverages (far short of bone-dryness, however) were imposed. Drunkenness took an astonishing drop during those years. Near the end of 1919 the Volstead Act went into effect. In 1920, the first year of national constitutional prohibition, there was a further drop which the 1921 rise wiped out. Since then there has been an increase every year, so that by 1926 there were more arrests for drunkenness than in any year except the 1916 war-boom peak.

To be exact, arrests for drunkenness in 1914 in the 403 places were 531,574, reached the war-boom peak of 563,792 in 1916, dropped to 237,101 in 1920, and rose in 1926 to 559,074.

Substantially the same rise occurred in the 534 places—increasing from 281,561 in 1920 to 664,101 in 1926. (No effort has been made to estimate fluctuations in population from year to year in the 602 places covered by this survey. At best such estimates would be speculative and open to suspicion of partisan bias. Only absolute figures, not susceptible of dispute, are here given.)

It is noteworthy that under the semidry war-time restrictions of 1918–19 there was a remarkably precipitate drop in drunkenness, and that under the bone-dry Volstead Act there has been an equally abrupt rise.

One of the interesting things disclosed by the survey is that while the low point of drunkenness in the former "wet" States was reached in 1920, the first year of constitutional prohibition, yet in the former "dry" States—States which had some kind of a state-wide dry law before the eighteenth amendment was ratified—the low point of drunkenness was in 1919 before national prohibition. In other words, in the "dry" States the increase in drunkenness had already begun in the first year of national prohibition.

Another noteworthy feature is that in the former "dry" States, drunkenness has now reached a considerably higher point, with reference to the 1914 level, than it has in the former "wet" States. Relatively, therefore, the "dry" States are now in worse condition, as compared with 1914, than are the "wet" States. President Harding sensed this tendency shortly before his death, when he said in his Denver speech in June, 1923: "It is a significant fact that some States which successfully enforced their own prohibition statutes before the eighteenth amendment was adopted have latterly gone backward in this regard."

Perhaps one reason for this greater increase in drunkenness in the "dry" States is that most of these so-called "dry" States were not really so, but were, in the main, merely restrictive. It is not generally known that bone-dryness is an absolutely new thing in this country. It did not exist at all before 1914, and substantially not at all before 1917, when the Reed amendment (a Federal statute), as a war-time measure, made it unlawful to ship intoxicants into "dry" States. Before the Reed amendment went into effect on July 1, 1917, it was lawful in almost every dry State for residents to have liquor shipped to them from wet States. Many of these dry States also permitted residents to make their own alcoholic beverages. It was, accordingly, the fact that before 1914 all, and before 1917 substantially all, of the dry States were merely partially dry; the idea being to abolish the saloon, not to force total abstinence on everyone. These semidry laws commanded a large public support and respect and accordingly did not cause the resentment which the bone-dry Volstead Act has since aroused. They appear, accordingly, to have worked much better in practice than the more recent bone-dry law.

How conditions have become much worse under the present "bone dry" law than they formerly were under State restrictions or semiprohibition is strikingly illustrated by the case of Atlanta. On January 1, 1908, Georgia got what was then called "state-wide prohibition." In fact the law prohibited manufacture and sale, thus outlawing the saloon, but it did not forbid importation in unlimited amounts for personal use. In 1916, during the war, the amount importable was limited to 2 quarts of spirits, 6 gallons of beer, or 1 gallon of wine within any 30 consecutive days. In 1917 a State "bone dry" law was passed and near the end of 1919 the Volstead Act became effective.

The results of these changes in the Georgia laws are instructive. As soon as the restrictive law went into effect in January, 1908, arrests for drunkenness fell from 6,508 in 1907 to 2,650 in 1909, and maintained that low level of around 3,000 per annum until the "bone dry" law was enacted in 1917. In 1919 drunkenness began to increase and has been increasing almost steadily ever since. In 1926 there were 7,594 arrests for drunkenness, which is much more than twice as high as the level maintained for the years 1908 to 1917, inclusive, during the more moderate State restrictive law.

Commenting on this condition in Atlanta the Bridgeport (Conn.) Post remarks editorially:

"Atlanta went dry by its own consent under State and local option. There was immediately a marked improvement in the situation. Arrests for drunkenness fell to a low level and remained at that level for a period of more than 10 years under a law imposed upon the people of the State entirely by their own consent and enforced with their own legal machinery.

"Then came the passage of the national prohibition act, and instantly the drunkenness rate in Georgia began to rise and has been rising ever since. All the good work of 10 years of temperance under local option has been undone, the city has receded to a condition as bad as that of 20 years ago, and national prohibition stands branded as a complete and abject failure in this test. Why ignore the facts, which are so patent and outstanding that one must put on blinkers of brass to avoid seeing them?"

The history of Birmingham is almost an exact duplicate. Before 1915 Alabama had a county local option law. Commencing in 1915 the State got a state-wide restrictive law prohibiting manufacture and sale of liquor, but permitting the importation of 2 quarts of spirits, 5 gallons of beer, or 2 gallons of wine every 15 days for personal use. The law also expressly permitted homemade wine. This continued to be the State law until it was superseded by the Volstead Act. Arrests for drunkenness fell from 3,481 in 1915 to 907 in 1916, and maintained this low level during the restrictive period, averaging 924 a year from 1916 to 1919. In 1921 arrests for drunkenness started on their astonishing climb upward, so that in 1926 there were 5,886 arrests for drunkenness, a level over six times greater than under the more moderate law.

From the cases of Atlanta, Birmingham, and other cities, which space forbids enumerating here, it appears to have been the experience that moderate restrictive legislation resulted in greater practical temperance, while the present bone dry Volstead Act has been followed by steadily increasing drunkenness.

DRUNKEN CHILDREN

By far the most distressing result of the Volstead Act is the increase in drinking among boys and girls and young people generally. There have been reports to this effect in the press so constantly from all over the United States that the matter has become common knowledge, commented upon in the more serious publications.

The Federal Council of Churches in its investigation of the subject sent questionnaires to 2,700 social workers, and a majority of the replies received stated that they observed more drinking by young people as compared with preprohibition times. (The Prohibition Situation, September, 1925, pp. 14–15.)

We think that if social workers as a class are prejudiced on the prohibition question, that prejudice is in favor of prohibition, and that consequently their testimony, if not absolutely unbiased, may be considered as an admission by friends of the Volstead Act that this unfortunate condition has resulted.

Liberty magazine made a similar inquiry from 90 correspondents throughout the United States, and the replies were almost unanimous that young people are drinking more than ever. ("These reports, coming from 90 centers of population, are strikingly similar in their conclusions. They are practically unanimous in stating that bootlegging is prevalent; that disrespect for the Volstead law has caused disrespect for other laws; that murder has become a common incident in the adventurous game of rum running; that the younger generation is drinking more than ever; that drunkenness is increasing; that prohibition is steadily losing ground." Liberty, January 23, 1926.)

It is rather commonly supposed that violations of the prohibition law are greater in New York City than elsewhere. Quite the contrary is true. The Federal Council of Churches, in its report in 1925, said: "There is no apparent justification for the common assumption that New York is 'wetter' than most other cities. In fact there is a reason to think that the reverse is true."

The above chart of arrests for drunkenness in New York City shows the situation at a glance. The high point in drunkenness was in 1903 when there were 53,396 arrests for intoxication. There was a remarkable and very uniform decline after that, until 1919, when the low point of 6,855 was reached. This low point was hardly more than one-eighth of the level of 1903.

Saloons were open and legal in New York City until July 1, 1919, when they were closed by Federal law. This astonishing decrease in drunkenness took place under the legal saloon.

It is noteworthy that as soon as national prohibition became effective this decline was halted and intoxication began to increase.

The number of arrests for drunkenness per capita in New York City nowadays is very much less than in the other large cities of the Nation.

In Topeka, Kans., the State where public sentiment is admittedly drier than anywhere else in the Union, the chief of police describes conditions as follows: "There is a phase that we have never had to deal with before—the drinking of young girls and boys, and their being brought in frequently for driving automobiles while under the influence of intoxicants. It was something that we never experienced before prohibition. They have just got to think that it is the smart thing to do. They do not think they are 'regular' unless they get half shot. The young girls simply will not go out with the boys who have not got flasks to offer or do not know where they can get intoxicants, and the real popular fellow is the fellow that knows most places where it can be obtained. And these barn dances; they are not what they used to be. They will erect a platform out in the country or in the environs of the city, and the boys and girls gather in droves, and soon out come the bottles and pints and flasks, and they get beer and 'spike' it with their alcohol. There are always dozens of drunks around at these affairs. They used to be more innocent things." (New York Herald-Tribune survey, 1926.)

Idaho has a very drastic State enforcement law, yet drinking among boys and girls there is, if anything, worse than in the Eastern States. The chief of police of Boise City says: "Young girls are going out and getting drunk with young boys in numbers and with a persistence such as we have never seen or heard of before. There have been outbursts of immorality among them that is directly traceable to the consumption of liquor. The excesses that have bobbed up every now and then among our high-school pupils have been one of the most alarming phases of the situation in this city, and I take it in other cities of the State. These young people get their bottles of hootch and rush out to some farm house on the outskirts of the city, and there indulge themselves to their heart's content." (New York Herald-Tribune survey, 1926.)

The sheriff of Ada County, Idaho, bears similar testimony: "I am a prohibitionist. * * * I have never taken a drink in my life, and I shudder to see what is happening under my eyes. * * * Probably the most alarming thing about this whole business is the number of young boys and girls that have been enmeshed in the strains of this traffic. Our docket shows dozens of minors—school boys and girls—who were picked up intoxicated or for reckless driving while under the influence of liquor. The number of these cases is really astounding. Every now and then a scandal breaks out of a serious nature and a dozen or more high-school girls and boys are sent off to some private institution outside the city and every precaution taken to protect the names of the pupils and families." (New York Herald-Tribune survey, 1926.)

The head of the Committee of Five Thousand, a welfare organization of Omaha, remarks: "We know about the drinking by children in school and out of school. We have no illusions about that." (New York Herald-Tribune survey, 1926.)

At Cheyenne, the capital of Wyoming, the chief of police declares: "The kids' drinking is something, I think, that did not happen so much before." (New York Herald-Tribune survey, 1926.)

The chief of police of a town under 10,000 population in Indiana writes: "Boys and girls under the age of 16 years are lectured and sent home, and there are many cases of boys and girls drinking alcohol, mule, Jamaica ginger, or some homemade concoction. Moral conditions are worse than they have been in 35 years."

Describing conditions in a Pennsylvania city of about 100,000 population, the chief of police writes: "There is more drinking of intoxicants by minors to-day than ever before. This drinking by young folks is carried on at private dances and parties, where it is usually brought in hip flasks. I also know of instances of mere schoolboys having been taken from the schoolroom intoxicated."

From a city in the State of Washington another chief writes: "In the last seven or eight years there has been a noticeable increase in drinking among the younger people of the city. Joy riding and petting parties are usually accompanied by liquor and usually result in serious accidents or the intervention of the police in some form."

The Federal prohibition director in North Dakota remarks: "We have drinking by high-school students. I would say that we have more drinking to-day by these youths than we did 10 years ago, before prohibition." (New York Herald-Tribune survey, 1926.)

In South Dakota the attorney general says: "There is a strange psychology about this liquor problem that makes it doubly significant. It is beginning to affect a different type of person than it did before. Now it is the youngster of the family of means who is toting the bottle. They think it smart to have a bottle on the hip and the girls encourage the boys to do it. And they rush about in cars. It is one of the most menacing phases of the whole situation." (New York Herald-Tribune survey, 1926.)

While there is a paucity of authoritative statistics on the subject of drunkenness among the young, apparently the largest increase has taken place among those from 15 to 25 years of age. Juvenile court records are of little value because they deal only with the very young who have not yet come into much spending money and who have not developed enough initiative to forage for liquor. The police department of Washington, D. C., however, has classified its arrests for drunkenness by ages, and its figures are illuminating. Saloons were officially closed in Washington as a war measure near the end of 1917. Arrests of minors (under 21) for drunkenness averaged 46.7 a year for the eight saloon years 1910–1917. The number was 36 in 1917. In 1918 and 1919 there was a considerable rise, followed in 1920, the first year of constitutional prohibition, by a drop, presumably due to a temporary scarcity of alcoholic beverages.

In 1921, however, there was a big rise which wiped out the 1920 drop. The increase since then has been almost constant, with the result that by 1926 the number of minors arrested for drunkenness had reached 340. This is an increase of 627 per cent above the saloon level of 1910–1917. Arrests of persons of all ages for drunkenness rose in 1926 not nearly so high above the preprohibition level, thus demonstrating that, relatively as well as absolutely, drunkenness among minors in Washington increased enormously.

These official figures for Washington completely confirm the other evidence on the subject as to the Nation as a whole, and seem to leave not the slightest doubt but that there has been a very considerable increase in drunkenness among the young. This can only mean that each year we are raising a new crop of drunkards which is much larger than the annual crops we used to raise, even under the saloon. Such a condition does not augur well for the success of the Volstead Act in the long run.

CONCLUSION

When we consider that drunkenness generally has already increased to the preprohibition level, and that drunken children have increased far above anything ever known before in this country, we can not escape the conclusion that the Volstead Act has failed utterly to do what it was intended to do, namely, promote temperance and sobriety. Moreover, since conditions have become worse, not better, each year, and with the "next generation" drinking as never before, there seems to be no hope that the Volstead Act, in its present drastic form, can ever accomplish its purpose.

From the experience, before national prohibition, of the States which had restrictive laws, from the experience of the whole country during the restrictive years 1918–19, and from the experience of the Canadian Provinces and the Scandinavian countries, we believe that a greater degree of temperance can be attained by a wise restrictive law than by a bone dry law which does not command the respect of a large part of the people.

We are also of the firm conviction that such a policy of wise restriction would have the incidental advantage of eliminating almost entirely, the scandalous corruption and bribery of public officials, would stop the growth of the bootlegging industry, would check disrespect for law, and would in addition produce a handsome national revenue.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSIONER ESCH

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written to Mr. T. W. Bennett, general manager of the South Carolina Produce Association, by Karl Knox Gartner, relative to Interstate Commerce Commissioner Esch.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Karl Knox Gartner, Allen G. Gartner, Smith Building, 815 Fifteenth Street]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1928.

Mr. T. W. BENNETT,
General Manager South Carolina Produce Association,
Meggett, S. C.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: A situation has developed here in the Senate in connection with the confirmation of Commissioner Esch's reappointment that may have very far-reaching effect and may serve to influence adversely the decision in our vegetable case.

The argument in the vegetable case, by the way, had to be postponed to March 29 in order to remove a conflict with a hearing that I have set out West for March 22.

The opposition to Mr. Esch's confirmation is based upon the fact that he changed his vote on rehearing in the Lake Cargo Coal case. The principle involved is the change of mind by a commissioner on rehearing. If the Senate refuses to confirm Mr. Esch on this ground, it is going to have a great influence indirectly on every other commissioner in connection with every case on rehearing. Because of this principle that is involved, it seems to me that the people of the country ought to stand for the reappointment of Mr. Esch, because the commission certainly should be free to correct any errors which it believes it has made in the original decision of the cases.

An even greater principle is involved in this matter, and that is that the commission should be free from political influence in the decision of its cases. A great political influence is being brought to bear to defeat Mr. Esch's appointment because he voted against certain powerful coal interests in Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and they are trying to demonstrate their political power not only to Commissioner Esch but to the rest of the commissioners. It is a most deplorable situation.

My purpose in bringing this matter to your attention is that you have mentioned several times that your association had some considerable influence with the Senators from South Carolina, and if you agree with me that is a bad thing to create the situation pointed out in this letter, which I am sure will only serve to weaken the commission and effect disadvantageously the outcome in our vegetable case, then I would suggest that you immediately upon receipt of this letter send a wire to Senators SMITH and BLEASE asking them to vote for the confirmation of Commissioner Esch's reappointment. This matter is very urgent, and if you are inclined to follow the suggestion here made, you will have to do so immediately as this matter will undoubtedly come up in the Senate the first of next week.

With kindest regards, I beg to remain,

Cordially yours,

KARL KNOX GARTNER.

PAY OF FILIPINOS, NATIONAL GUARD OF HAWAII

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2007) to authorize the Secretary of War to pay officers and Filipinos formerly enlisted as members of the National Guard of Hawaii for field and armory training during years 1924 and 1925, and to validate payments for such training heretofore made, which was, on page 1, line 3, to strike out all after the word "authorized" down to and including the amount "$4,000," in line 6, same page.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut to make a very brief explanation of what the House amendment accomplishes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be glad to do so. Mr. CRAMTON in the House, who proposed the amendment, said in regard to it:

The purpose of this amendment is simply to strike out the language which says this is to be paid out of a certain appropriation heretofore made. This constitutes an appropriation and puts a new burden upon the fund. I do not believe this is a good practice to follow. With this language eliminated the payment is authorized and the question can be determined later as to the source of the payment.

Does that answer the question of the Senator?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator's motion is to concur in the House amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator state what is the question before the Senate?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is my motion that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to a bill permitting the Secretary of War to pay certain Filipinos in the Hawaiian National Guard the money which they earned, but could not receive, because it was found later that they were not citizens of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand there is only about $4,000 involved?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all that is involved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

LOTS IN PENSACOLA, FLA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2021) extending and continuing to January 12, 1930, the provisions of "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to determine and confirm by patent in the nature of a deed of quitclaim the title to lots in the city of Pensacola, Fla.," approved January 12, 1925, which was, on page 1, line 8, after the figures "1930," to insert:

Provided, That there be paid to the register of the district land office a fee of $5 for each lot described in an application for a deed of quitclaim under the said act, which fee shall be considered earned irrespective of the action taken on the application.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL AID TO GOOD ROADS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short article on the subject of Federal aid to good roads, prepared by Mr. T. J. Davis, chairman good roads committee, Tennessee Rural Carriers' Association, of Edison, Tenn.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ten reasons why Senate bill 1945 (McKellar road bill) should be passed by the Seventieth Congress, first session:

First. Federal appropriations under the Bankhead bill and subsequent bills, having all been expended on the 7 per cent or primary system, but few rural people are receiving any benefits from these appropriations.

Second. Seventy-five per cent of the farms of the United States (agricultural census 1925) are on dirt roads and a very large per cent of them are 10, 15, 20, 25, and 30 miles from their places of markets. They must have some highway relief.

Third. The scarcity of rural physicians is a serious proposition. It is claimed that approximately 1,000,000 mothers in our country are without medical attention at childbirth annually (Collier's Weekly). With a good system of roads we would have enough physicians to care for all the people.

Fourth. Estimating the saving in gasoline and other expenses by either $70 annual loss per motor vehicle on account of unimproved or low-type roads, or by the saving of one-third in gasoline by higher type roads, the annual saving to the whole country by a system of good roads throughout the country would reach from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 (counting one-fourth of the gasoline consumption on the roads not in the 48 State highway systems). By a system of good roads throughout the country we do not mean that all roads should be paved or even surfaced. We mean a system of roads maintained so as to adequately meet the economic traffic demands of the different localities.

The answers to one question of a questionnaire are sent to each of the 48 State highway departments convinces me that the passage of the McKellar road bill means that practically all rural routes would soon become year-round automobile roads.

Fifth. If all rural routes could be served the year round in motor vehicles, the personnel of the rural carrier force could be cut from 45,000 to at least 18,000, and probably 15,000, at an annual saving in salaries of $35,000,000 to $40,000,000. The mileage would be reduced considerably by eliminating duplication of service and retracing. The three rural routes here with 75 miles could be served by one carrier with a route of 64 miles at an annual saving of about $2,700. This same rate would perhaps hold true in most localities, but density of population and amount of mail would be factors in governing the length of routes as well as road conditions.

Retirements on age and bad health, deaths, transfers to other branches of the post-office service, would take care of the rural carriers whose routes would be consolidated.

Sixth. In many sections of the country rural routes can be served only on horseback and in horse-drawn vehicles. Even on thousands of routes that can be served in motor vehicles during the summer months, horses are used during the winter and spring months. The heavy loads of parcel post make it impossible to render good, regular, and prompt service. We have seen carriers forced to hire additional help in serving their routes, due to road conditions.

Seventh. Federal aid so far has been used only in building the trunk-line highways and is only a very small part of the total amount spent annually on public roads.

In 1926, the Federal-aid appropriation was only 12⅛ per cent of the total amount spent by State highway departments and only 6 per cent of total amount spent on State, county, and local roads. We could well afford to double our Federal-aid appropriations for post roads.

Eighth. In 1926 the Federal-aid money, $75,000,000 was spent in constructing 26,652 miles of road. The States, counties, and local governments spent $1,288,939,707 on 3,006,083 miles of rural road. The Federal Government is doing very little when we consider the total mileage of rural roads and the total annual expenditures on these roads.

Ninth. Most States are using all, or practically all, of the money collected for road purposes on the State highway systems. But few counties and local governments, except those with cities, could raise sufficient money to adequately maintain their roads without taxing the farmers beyond the point of endurance. Many counties would be compelled to double their present tax rate to do so.

Tenth. The rural population is rapidly decreasing as a result of bad roads. The net decrease in 1926 was 1,365,000. This does not tell the whole story. The decrease is on the unimproved roads. In fact, the population is increasing along the surfaced highways at the expense of the sections of unimproved highways. The schools and churches along the unimproved highways are going down and the farms are being abandoned. It is a rare thing to see a new home constructed along the unimproved highways. On the improved highways new homes are being constructed at a rapid rate. There are very few empty houses on the improved highways. On the unimproved the empty houses are numerous, and many are being torn down. This is true in each of the 48 States of the Union.

RELOCATION OF FARMERS' MARKET IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief on the subject of the relocation of the farmers' market in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the brief was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIEF PREPARED FOR SUBMISSION TO THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, RELATING TO THE RELOCATION OF THE FARMERS' MARKET IN WASHINGTON, D. C., BY THE FARMERS AND ALLIED INTERESTS

(See list of organizations at end of brief)

Reports of the United States Department of Agriculture and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia show that over 50 per cent of the fresh fruits and vegetables supplied to the people of Washington comes through the present farmers' market. Congress, in 1870, provided a means whereby farmers in the immediate vicinity of Washington could centralize their selling, thereby enabling consumers to secure such food products at the lowest cost of distribution by affording them an opportunity to purchase direct from the producer. This market has steadily grown in favor with the consumers as is evidenced by the fact that during the last fiscal year 63,000 truck loads of produce were brought to this center and sold to the people either direct or through distributors for approximately $2,500,000.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia state (Doc. No. 119, 70th Cong., 1st sess.): "It is generally agreed that it is desirable to all concerned to encourage the retail feature of the farmers' market. This was brought out very strongly in conference with the officials of the Department of Agriculture." A fair estimate has been made by all authorities that at least 20 per cent of the products distributed through the farmers' market are sold retail. Thus, the consumers of Washington are purchasing, direct from the farmers, food products aggregating $600,000 per year. The balance of the produce is sold wholesale to stores, boarding houses, restaurants, hotels, and other buyers, including commission merchants. The business conducted by the farmers' market is, therefore, both retail and wholesale, and as such it is obvious that the proper selection of a future site is vital not only to the farmers but also to the consumers of Washington.

The population of the city of Washington is to-day approximately 540,000 persons. Of this number four-fifths, or 432,000, live north of Pennsylvania Avenue. Of the 133 hotels and boarding houses in Washington 130 are located north of Pennsylvania Avenue. Of the 690 restaurants and lunch rooms, 616 are north of Pennsylvania Avenue. There are 1,764 chain stores, of which 1,361 are located north of Pennsylvania Avenue. Thus, the great preponderance of the food-consuming public patronizing the farmers' market is in the area north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

WHY THE FARMERS' MARKET SHOULD BE LOCATED NORTH OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE

CONSUMERS' VIEWPOINT

First. Over 90 per cent of the citizens' associations of the District of Columbia, including the Citizens' Advisory Council, the Federation of Women's Clubs, with a membership of over 15,000; the Women's City Club, and virtually every civic organization have gone on record as approving a site north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

LIVING COSTS

Second. Retail trade on the farmers' market, enabling the consumer to buy direct from the producer, is a price-stabilizing factor. To serve adequately the consumer and to be a factor in reducing the cost of living, the farmers' market must be located where it can be conveniently patronized by the public. Bill H. R. 8298 providing for the relocation of the farmers' market in southwest Washington, at the extreme edge of the city and District, approachable from two sides only, specifically provides that the market be strictly wholesale, thus depriving the small consumer of the benefit of dealing direct with the producer.

FARMERS' VIEWPOINT

Third. What group of people aside from the consumers is mostly interested in a farmers' produce market? It is the farmers bringing produce to Washington who make this market possible. It is these farmers who supply the city of Washington with over 50 per cent of its perishable farm products. Almost unanimously they oppose the southwest site and favor a location north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

Their objections to the southwest site are:

1. It is far removed from four-fifths of the consuming public.
2. It is difficult for the majority of them to reach.
3. It is inaccessible to their customers, both retail and wholesale.
4. Here they will be deprived of a considerable portion, if not all, of their retail trade.
5. The area is too small to provide even fair accommodation for the present number of farmers, with absolutely no opportunity for future growth.
6. They object to being separated from the leading commission merchants, who have already announced their intention to locate north of Pennsylvania Avenue.
7. They do not want to be compelled to go through dense traffic areas in going to and from their market.
8. Farmers are in sympathy with the beautification program of the city of Washington and feel that heavy truck traffic of the character incident to the operation of a farmers' market is not desirable in the vicinity of the Mall.
9. Finally the farmers on this market do not use and therefore can not profit by cold-storage warehouses, water-transportation facilities, and railroad terminals which have been exploited as the principal advantages of the southwest location. Primarily, the farmers' interest is in securing a location easy of access, large enough to prevent congestion in and surrounding the market, within easy reach of the consuming public, and where they can be closely associated with the main body of commission merchants and other allied business interests. For these reasons the farmers have consistently urged a location north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

ALLIED BUSINESS

Fourth. It has been recommended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, and the United States Bureau of Efficiency that the farmers' produce market be located in close proximity to the commission merchants. Commission merchants handling 5,500 of the estimated 7,000 car lots of fruits and vegetables shipped to Washington annually, or 85 per cent of the total shipments, have purchased a new location for their business north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

RAILROAD FACILITIES

Fifth. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have recommended to Congress that from an economic standpoint a centralized perishable food-market area must be located at a railroad terminal where receivers can deliver direct from the cars, thereby reducing the present high cost of drayage. Freight deliveries are made to the southwest site by one railroad only. The most adequate railroad facilities and the only express depot handling perishable commodities are located north of Pennsylvania Avenue. This area is served by two main trunk-line systems, whose connecting lines reach all parts of the United States. Freight rates and refrigerating charges are the same to this area as they are to southwest Washington. Unlike southwest Washington, there is ample area north of Pennsylvania Avenue to develop additional freight terminal facilities to economically take care of the future growth and development of the city.

SIZE

Sixth. The size of the proposed southwest site for the farmers' market is too small to accommodate the 601 farmers using the present market. Provision is made for only 401 and there is not room for further expansion.

SUITABILITY OF SITE

Seventh. The southwest site, because of its topography, will not lend itself to the construction of a serviceable farmers' market. Even to make it usable would cost $110,000 over and above the purchase price and not including the cost of shelters or buildings. On none of the proposed sites north of Pennsylvania Avenue will this difficulty be encountered.

COST OF SITE

Eighth. The southwest site is unnecessarily expensive. Several desirable sites north of Pennsylvania Avenue are available at a much lower cost per foot and which do not require the building of retaining walls or expensive stepping to make them usable.

ACCESSIBILITY

Ninth. Transportation to the proposed southwest site either by street car or automobile is restricted. Only one street car line passes this site and the traffic lanes from the main residential sections of the city are few in number and pass through heavily congested traffic zones. Far better street-car facilities and unlimited automobiles thoroughfares are to be found north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

TRAFFIC PROBLEMS

Tenth. Locating the farmers' market in southwest Washington would continue the necessity of passing automobile and truck traffic totaling 60,000 loads of farm produce per year through the densest traffic area of the city, to be unloaded at an inaccessible point and redistributed in smaller volume by many more vehicles through the same congested area in order to reach the consuming sections of the city. Further traffic congestion will be encountered in the southwest because of Government buildings located north and south of the Mall. This condition will not improve when additional buildings now under construction are completed and when still other contemplated buildings are erected north of the Mall. The only north and south highways running through the Mall that could serve the market at this site are Sixth Street, Seventh Street, Twelfth Street, and Fourteenth Street, and upon completion of the public building program this number will be further restricted. Public buildings now occupying the Mall preclude the possibility of extending other streets through this section. No such difficulties are presented north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

PARKING FACILITIES

Eleventh. The southwest with its narrow streets provides most inadequate parking facilities, while the wider streets north of Pennsylvania Avenue will not easily be congested by the parking necessity in the vicinity of a properly located farmers' market.

BUILDING PROGRAM

Twelfth. The location of the farmers' market north of Pennsylvania Avenue will be in accord with the recommendations of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and other governmental agencies looking toward the future development and beautification of the Nation's Capital.

OTHER OBJECTIONS

Thirteenth. A serious objection to the location of a farmers' produce market on squares 354 and 355 in southwest Washington is that the Fairbrother School is located directly across the street from square 354. The health and lives of the 169 children attending this school would be jeopardized due to the great danger of accident on account of the amount of increased traffic. The five-year school building program calls for the building of a 12-room addition to this school. Suitable locations for the farmers' produce market are available north of Pennsylvania Avenue where the lives of children will not thus be jeopardized.

We, the undersigned, representing the expressed wishes of 90 per cent of the organized citizenship of Washington, 90 per cent of the farmers actually using the market, and 85 per cent of the business of the commission merchants, respectfully petition your honorable committee to remember that it is a farmers' market which is under consideration; that its proper location is of tremendous concern not only to the producers but also the consumers who can make direct purchases thereon. It is our hope that your committee will place this market where the majority of the citizens want it; where the farmers can reach it; near consuming centers; near the large commission merchants; where the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, the Department of Agriculture, and the Bureau of Efficiency believe it should be, which is north of Pennsylvania Avenue.

James G. Yaden, chairman Citizens' Advisory Council; Mrs. Virginia White Speel, president District Federation of Women's Clubs; A. J. Driscoll, president Mid-City Citizens' Association; H. A. Friday, representing 400 farmers attending the market; Alex. Gude, representing Prince Georges County Pomona Grange; Stanley Lowe, representing Prince Georges County Pomona Grange; J. W. Jones, representing Montgomery County Farm Bureau; Herbert Thompson, representing farmers of Montgomery County, Md.; J. O. Harrison, representing commission merchants; H. J. Klein, representing commission merchants; F. J. Ward, representing commission merchants; S. B. Shaw, representing Maryland State Department of Markets; T. B. Symons, chairman Prince Georges County Pomona Grange committee for relocation of farmers' produce market.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which has been printed and is now lying on the table. The effect of the amendment is to bring the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps under the provisions of the bill.

I understand that the Senator in charge of the bill has no objection to the amendment and I hope that it will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 3, after the word "Army," insert a comma and the words "Navy or Marine Corps."

On page 1, line 5, following the comma after the word "Army," insert the words "Navy or Marine Corps."

On page 2, line 1, following the comma after the word "Bureau," insert the words "for disability resulting directly from such war service."

On page 2, line 4, strike out the article "a"; change the word "list" to "lists"; and strike out the article "a" before the word "part."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, in line 7, page 1, I move to strike out the words "two years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 7, strike out the words "two years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year," so as to make the clause read:

> That all persons who have served as officers of the Army of the United States during the World War, other than as officers of the Regular Army, who during such service have incurred physical disability in line of duty, and who have been, or may hereafter, within one year, be, rated in accordance with the law at not less than 30 per cent permanent disability—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON].

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to its adoption.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYSON. Also, in section 2, on page 4, line 1, I move to strike out the words "twenty-four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

Mr. KING. What is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. TYSON. With the idea of limiting the time to one year instead of two years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 1, strike out the words "twenty-four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve," so as to make the clause read:

> No person shall be entitled to benefits under the provisions of this act except he make application as hereinbefore provided and his application is received in the United States Veterans' Bureau within 12 months after the passage of this act—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] if he desires to speak on the bill at this time?

Mr. BROOKHART. I had thought to speak briefly, but I am not particular whether I do so at this time or later.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to have the Senator proceed at this time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the argument against the bill seems to be based mainly upon the proposition that it fails to do justice to somebody else. That argument would have some weight if the bill was a foreclosure of the entire situation. But the bill only purports to do justice to about 3,000 officers and, so far as the enlisted men are concerned, it is no interference with or foreclosure whatever of their rights or their claims to justice in the future.

Therefore, it seems to me, the argument as to the inequality between the officers and the enlisted men entirely falls down. I can see no occasion for making that claim, and I doubt if any of those who oppose the bill would favor it if the enlisted men were included; in fact, I think they would be more strongly opposed to the bill than they now are, because they contend that the bill is based on the principle of an autocracy or an aristocracy; and yet it is mainly aristocrats who are opposing the bill. I think it is because of those who will have to pay the expense rather than because of the autocratic idea.

So far as armies are concerned, they are always autocratic institutions. Militarism is always a species of autocracy. I do not believe in militarism; nobody in the United States believes in it; but in so far as we must have an Army for the national defense, in order to be efficient, it will continue to be an autocracy. The system of rank and of higher pay for officers is thoroughly grounded in the military system. If we are going to have a military organization, there is no way under our civilization to escape from that situation.

The same arguments against the method of remuneration under this bill apply as against the Army itself. The system in the Army may be just; but, so far as I am concerned, I am willing right now to do a great deal toward equalizing the pay of enlisted men and the officers of the Army. I do not care if it shall cost more, so far as that is concerned. So long as we allow war profiteering, I will not vote against increasing the pay of either the enlisted men or the officers; so long as we indulge in that inequality, I stand for more favorable treatment of the officers and of the men. The bill we are now considering will apply to only about 3,000 officers who suffered as a result of the World War.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the junior Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I should be glad to be advised by the able Senator from Iowa on what he bases his statement that the bill will affect only about 3,000 officers. May I say to the Senator that already applications for compensation have been filed by reserve officers to the number of more than 41,000? There are more than 10,142 already on the compensation list, with the number being increased weekly. There is no limitation in this bill as to the number of officers who will receive the benefits of retirement; and the Senator from Iowa must know that if we restrict the applications to one year, later, if officers desire to make application, Congress will respond. So I ask the Senator if, in his further consideration of the subject, he does not agree with me that the number who will be beneficiaries under this bill can not be determined, but it may reach twenty-five, thirty, or forty thousand, or a still greater number than that?

Mr. BROOKHART. I will say to the Senator that if it shall turn out in that way, I shall be all the prouder that I voted for the bill. The more it may benefit the more satisfactory it will be to me.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator, of course, does not claim that the application of the bill is limited to 3,000 men?

Mr. BROOKHART. The number of 3,000 I got from other Senators who have spoken, and I think that is the number which is carried on the Veterans' Bureau records at the present time, if I understand the matter correctly.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that when the so-called Bursum bill was under consideration only a short time ago—and the bill now before us is the Bursum bill under a new name; it is now called the Tyson bill—it was alleged that there were but 1,875 who would be the beneficiaries. It is now conceded that the number who are listed as having a disability rating above 30 per cent—though I have the figures somewhere, I do not have them at hand at the moment—is possibly about 4,000, somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,400.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in order that we may keep the RECORD straight in regard to the pending measure as to the number of officers who will be benefited by it, I wish to call attention to the letter from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, found in the report of the committee, in which he says:

Were the bill amended to provide for retirement of disabled ex-emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps—

And that is just what we have done—

as well as those of the Army, it is estimated that the total number of officers affected will be raised to 3,223.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, in accordance with my former answer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I will say that the bill is getting better, so far as my view of it is concerned. I think there was a very grave injustice done to the soldiers of the World War. We drafted those men at $30 a month, and the officers at comparatively small compensation; then we allowed capital to profiteer, to make millionaires in every direction out of the profits of the war—the blood money of the war. When we come to compensate any one of those classes who served in the Army during the World War, I will not, as a matter of principle, fight any of them. I shall be found favoring the officers when their case shall be brought up. I have already introduced at this session, and I mean to press for a hearing, a pension bill for all the soldiers of the World War, placing them on the same status as veterans of the Spanish war. I shall not hesitate to vote for any measure which will bring about an equality between the men who served in the World War and the capital that was employed during that war. We shall never reach such an equality. All the pensions, all the compensation, and all the other favors we may grant to the soldiers of the World War will continue to be very slight, indeed, in comparison with the benefits obtained by the profiteers during that war.

I think it is a false theory of patriotism that the soldier shall give his life and his time in the service of his country without compensation and that capital shall be allowed to take an exorbitant compensation. I understand that a tentative arrangement has already been made for the next war, whereby we are to guarantee 6 per cent profit to the capital of the country during the war, and at the same time to have a universal draft of men at, perhaps, one-third of the compensation they would receive in civil life. If the profit to capital were reduced to one-third, it would amount to less than 2 per cent, instead of 6 per cent, because all capital, taking it the country over, only earns 5½ per cent.

So, Mr. President, I favor this bill. I do not believe that the dire prognostications which have been advanced by the Senator from Connecticut will come to be realized. I do not believe this bill will upset our Military Establishment, but, on the contrary, I believe it will benefit it, because in all our wars it has been the citizen army that has defended the country. It is the citizen army on which we must rely. The Senator from New Jersey put interesting figures in the RECORD, showing that of all the officers killed in the World War only 7 per cent of them belonged to the Regular Army. I wish to put in, from the same authority, Col. Leonard P. Ayres, a statement that out of the 17 divisions which were organized by the National Guard during the World War all 17 of them went across to France; 11 of them fought as units, and the others as replacements. Of the 20 National Army divisions, made up of the citizens of the country, all 20 went across the sea, and all of them made good records, from a military standpoint, in France during the World War. Of the 20 Regular divisions, which were organized, only 8 of them went across. The other 12 were on this side until after the war was over, when some of them were sent to Germany during the period of occupation.

It has been said that they were on this side training the civilian soldiers, but the civilian soldiers were all on the other side. I remember that I, myself, was ordered to train the Nineteenth Regular Division in markmanship about the 1st of October, 1918. I was with them up to a few days before the armistice, and I was training them; they were not training me. That division contained two of the oldest Regular regiments, the Second and the Fourteenth, and, of course, they did not go across the ocean and see service during the war.

We have done a great injustice at all times in the way of compensation and in the way of honors and in every other direction to the citizen soldiers of this country. That was especially true during the World War, when they were held down to lower ranks and put into the fighting, although many of them were competent to serve in higher positions. I know of one division which was held on this side, on the Mexican border, overtrained, trained stale, in tactics which might be of use at that place, but which could not be used in the World War, waiting all the time to find a regular officer to command it. In that division I know of at least one National Guard officer who was better able to command it than any regular who ever did command it, and he was made a colonel in the Regular Army after the war was over.

Mr. President, here is a bill proposing to give a small measure of equality to the citizen soldiers of this country. It proposes to give it only to a limited extent; it is only a start; but I do not think it would be right to turn around and use the argument that because it does not reach out and do justice to every man who served in the Army during the World War, therefore we will refuse to do justice to the officers who will be the beneficiaries of the bill.

Mr. KING addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time—

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah suspend for a few moments?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH'S INVITATION

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Vice President be permitted, out of order, to lay before the Senate the invitation received from Colonel Lindbergh.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The President of the Senate has received the following letter:

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: My present plans call for making a number of flights at Bolling Field, D. C., on the afternoon of March 20 and 21 and the entire day of March 22.

It would give me great pleasure to carry any of the Members of the Senate who would care to make a flight at this time.

It will be possible for me to take from 8 to 10 passengers at a time in the equipment which the Army and Navy have kindly made available.

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES A. LINDBERGH.

The Chair would suggest that those desiring to avail themselves of this invitation leave their names with the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask the privilege of saying that I am sure every Senator appreciates the great courtesy which Colonel Lindbergh has shown Senators in this invitation, and I know that many Senators will be delighted to avail themselves of the opportunity to take a flight with the renowned aviator. Furthermore, such Senators as fail to accept the invitation will not imply the slightest lack of appreciation of the very great courtesy extended us by Colonel Lindbergh.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish merely to say that a week or two ago two or three Senators had the pleasure of going up with Colonel Lindbergh. It is perfectly safe; the airplane is very pleasant, furnished with comfortable wicker chairs, it seats eight aside from the man at the controls, who, I think, will take splendid care of any Senators who may desire to take a flight with him.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk correspondence between Hon. Clem Shaver, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and Hon. Jesse H. Jones, of Houston, Tex., director of finance, together with an editorial from the Times-Dispatch, of Richmond, Va., which I ask that the clerk may read.

Mr. CURTIS. Would not the Senator be willing to have the matter printed in the RECORD without having it read?

Mr. MAYFIELD. The correspondence contains such valuable information that I would like to have the Senate hear it read.

Mr. CURTIS (to Mr. MAYFIELD). Go ahead.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

Houston convention fund, by Jesse H. Jones	200,000
Total	508,500

Of this amount I hold, as chairman and treasurer of your committee on arrangements, $200,000, contributed by citizens of Houston for the convention fund. Contributions in cash since Treasurer Gerard's last report total $141,250. When the other pledges are paid your committee will be entirely out of debt and have probably $250,000 with which to start the next campaign. In addition to the above, several members of the committee have indicated their willingness to raise a fair quota for their several localities.

I want to take this opportunity of expressing on your behalf and on behalf of the Democrats of the country due appreciation to these contributors and those heretofore reported for the very generous way they have met the necessities of your committee since the campaign of 1924, which campaign left us considerably in debt. It seemed inadvisable immediately to undertake to raise the money with which to pay the committee's indebtedness from that campaign, and it has not appeared advisable to make a canvass for funds since that time even to pay the running expenses of the committee. Therefore we have borrowed for that purpose and have asked the indulgence of some of our creditors, who have been extremely generous in awaiting our convenience. I also wish to say that no contribution has been solicited or made upon any condition except that enough money be raised to pay the committee entirely out of debt. This condition has now been met, and I am therefore able to so report.

For a party out of power to be able to get contributions in such substantial amounts from all parts of the country is an indication of party loyalty and party hope, and of the everlasting belief by these contributors in the principles for which the Democratic Party stands.

Yours very truly,

JESSE H. JONES,
Director of Finance, Democratic National Committee.

MARCH 7, 1928.

HON. JESSE H. JONES,
Director of Finance, Democratic National Committee,
Houston, Tex.

MY DEAR MR. JONES: Your letter of February 29 received, for which, on behalf of the Democratic National Committee, I thank you.

It is a great source of gratification that you and other party friends throughout the country have, through your generosity, made this possible.

It is a satisfaction to myself to know that we are going to be able to report a substantial surplus with which to start the coming campaign.

I am to-day transmitting your statement to the Hon. James W. Gerard, treasurer of the Democratic National Committee, to be embodied in his report.

Very sincerely yours,

CLEM SHAVER,
Chairman Democratic National Committee.

[From the Times-Dispatch, Richmond, Va.]

GENIUS JONES

Jesse Jones came out of Texas some weeks ago and, armed with naught save his fountain pen, captured the Democratic National Convention for Houston. By the simple gesture of a blank check given a Democracy chronically without any of the bonds of which Republicans seem to have plenty, Jesse became almost a legendary figure.

Just a short time ago, when Mr. Jones had momentarily left the front pages, news came that he had collected together enough money to pay off the entire debt owed by his party.

The man is remarkable. He might do anything. It is even possible to hope that at Houston this summer Jesse will see that a candidate with a chance to win is nominated and that deadlocks and accompanying sweating and clowning is reduced to a sensible basis.

Perhaps some day Jesse Jones will be called "the greatest Secretary since the-greatest-Secretary-since-Hamilton."

RADIO BROADCASTING IN THE SOUTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Caldwell, a member of the Radio Commission, in which he expresses great interest in radio broadcasting in the South. He said, among other things:

Every fair-minded student of radio recognizes that the South is entitled to more radio stations. I am, therefore, in fullest sympathy with the intent of the present radio legislation before Congress.

Further he said:

It is my feeling, as you know, that each radio commissioner must think nationally, and in weaving the complicated radio fabric across our continent I am with you in demanding for the South its full share of radio facilities.

I ask that the entire letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The letter is as follows:

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION,
Washington, March 15, 1928.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: It was indeed kind of you to write me under date of March 13 acknowledging the efforts which I have made as a member of the Federal Radio Commission to secure adequate broadcasting power for southern radio stations.

Certainly Judge Sykes, acting chairman and commissioner from the southern zone, will bear me out in the statement that every recommendation of his for more radio facilities for the South which has been put before the commission has immediately had my vote of approval. When delays have occurred, these have been necessitated by difficulties in immediately finding places for the increases.

Every fair-minded student of radio recognizes that the South is entitled to more radio stations. I am therefore in thorough sympathy with the intent of the present radio legislation before Congress.

It is my belief that as rapidly as the South applies for stations which will be operated by people able to provide good programs such licenses should be granted, at the expense of the gradual reduction of the powers in other parts of the country.

You, and other members of the southern delegation, will be interested in learning that a number of further power increases and licenses for southern stations, which Judge Sykes has requested, were tentatively approved by the commission some weeks ago, and will be announced and made effective just as soon as the legal status of the commission's right to make these increases is confirmed.

My own southern birthright, and inheritance of a long southern ancestry, coupled with many years of personal associations in Kentucky, Alabama, Texas, Louisiana, the Carolinas, and Virginia, have enabled me to know first-hand the specially useful service which radio can render to the great and growing southern region.

It is my feeling, as you know, that each radio commissioner must think nationally, and in weaving the complicated radio fabric across our continent I am with you in demanding for the South its full share of radio facilities.

Cordially yours,

O. H. CALDWELL, Commissioner.

CANAL FROM GREAT LAKES TO THE SEA

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], delivered before the Detroit Bankers' Association recently, on the subject of a canal from the Great Lakes to the sea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The address is as follows:

A CANAL TO THE SEA

From the earliest days of our history it is apparent that an interest has been taken in the waterways and the possibilities of navigable canals between the Great Lakes and the sea. During the past few years, particularly since the economic troubles of the wheat farmers of the West became so pronounced, there has been renewed discussion of this idea. There is much talk of building such a waterway in order that the Great Lakes may become a second Mediterranean. There are dreams that many ocean-going vessels may proceed westward to tie up at docks in Detroit, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Chicago, and Duluth.

Regarding this project there are two schools of thought. The St. Lawrence route is held in high favor in the West. But many thinking Americans feel that if the money of the Nation is to be expended in canal building it should be spent wholly within the borders of our country. These are they who advocate what is known as the all-American route, a canal connecting the eastern end of Lake Ontario with the headwaters of the Hudson River.

The latter project would involve an initial expenditure of more money, but it would be hundreds of miles shorter, open for a slightly longer season, and, for the purposes of the national defense, would be of greater service to the Nation. The all-American route coincides with the present lines of railroad travel and leads to the same terminals on the seacoast. Such a canal development, it is thought, would be less disturbing to commerce and trade during the third of the year when either water route would be closed by ice.

A great many surveys have been made by the Federal Government, the New York State authorities, the Canadian Government, and recently by an international joint commission. The result of these surveys is that we have at our command a mass of scientific and statistical material. With this before him, it is possible for any citizen to master the problems involved and to form for himself a conclusion as to which route is preferable. Both are considered feasible from an engineering standpoint. Each has its particular advantages. Each has its engineering and scientific backers. It may be said in all truth that a given citizen may form his own conclusion and, no matter what it may be, find himself in company with thousands of distinguished citizens who take a like view. Unfortunately, he will find himself in opposition to other thousands of distinguished citizens who are equally insistent that the other route is preferable.

It is my purpose to bring together in the briefest possible way the arguments, pro and con. I shall attempt to marshal the facts, and frankly admitting the greater popularity of the St. Lawrence waterway, attempt to prove that the all-American canal is the one which should command the indorsement and financial support of the taxpayers of the country.

Even though these views are contrary to the conviction already formed, I hope the advocates of the St. Lawrence route will give renewed study to the problem, in order that they may make sure their conclusion is well founded. I pledge myself to listen with respect to any arguments which may be brought forward to overthrow the conviction I have that for the sake of the commercial supremacy of the United States and its national defense, the all-American route should be accepted.

Unfortunately, whichever way is determined upon, the most we can expect of such a canal is that it shall be serviceable for not to exceed eight months of the year. In 50 years the latest the St. Lawrence was open for navigation was the 14th of December. Three times only was it open past the 8th of December. Usually it closes about the 20th of November.

During the same period, the earliest date it ever opened was the 29th of March. One year it opened on the 3rd of April. Usually it opens about the 20th of April and occasionally as late as the 1st of May. One year it was the 7th of May. As a matter of fact, then, the St. Lawrence can be depended on for only a little more than seven months of the year.

It is not alone, however, the absence of ice in the river that insures safety of navigation between the Great Lakes and the sea. I speak from actual observation, having crossed the ocean twice between Montreal and Liverpool. I well recall a certain Sunday morning in July, 1896. The ship I was upon was the first one that season to attempt the passage of the Strait of Belleisle. In spite of the fact that navigation opened on the 24th of April, there was so much ice and so much fog in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and off the Strait of Belleisle that it had not been deemed safe to take the northern route until we attempted the passage.

I well recall that on the morning in question my steward called me at daybreak. He said there was an iceberg in sight and that I had better get up and see it because another one might not be sighted on the trip. As a matter of fact, we saw 75 icebergs during that day and the next. The temperature of the water was being taken continually in order that we might not run into one of these great mountains of ice, feeling our way as we were through the fog.

No candid person conversant with the physical conditions of the lower St. Lawrence and of that route to the sea can fail to acknowledge that through a majority of the months of the year there is not uninterrupted passage between Montreal and the open ocean. I speak of this in no spirit of disparagement, but simply to bring into mind the embarrassments and dangers of this particular route, as compared with another one equally available, which is not burdened by these objections.

COMPARATIVE DISTANCES AND SAILING TIMES BY THE TWO ROUTES

At this point I wish to bring out the marked difference in distance between Lake Ontario and the ocean by the two routes. By the St. Lawrence it is 166 miles to Cornwall where the river leaves our boundary, 66 miles from there to Montreal, 1,003 miles to the ocean, a total of 1,185 miles. From Lake Ontario to Albany is 164 miles and from Albany by the Hudson River to the ocean 150 miles, a total of 314 miles. From Lake Ontario to New York City by the St. Lawrence route is 1,500 miles. By the all-American route it is a trifle over 300 miles. Whether the cargo is to be taken to Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, of course, the distance is many hundreds of miles greater by way of the St. Lawrence.

The advocates of the Canadian route place great emphasis upon the fact that it is much nearer by way of the St. Lawrence from the Great Lakes to Liverpool, where the wheat would go, than it is by the all-American canal. It is stated, for instance, that the distance between Montreal and Liverpool is 2,760 miles. But this is through the Strait of Belleisle which, as I have already indicated, can not be used during a considerable portion of the season. The distance from Montreal to Liverpool when the route taken is to the south of Newfoundland is 3,007 miles, practically the same as the distance between New York and Liverpool, a distance of 3,166 miles. To put it in a word—it is 159 miles shorter than by the all-American route. That is all.

Where the St. Lawrence route reaches the ocean is at a point more than 1,000 miles east and 700 miles north of the confluence of Lake Ontario with the river. The Strait of Belleisle is far removed from the United States and all our ports. There is no port and nothing to appeal to American commerce all the way from Lake Ontario to the shores of Europe.

I desire to be eminently fair in making any statement relating to a waterway to the ocean. To this end I must state that, while the difference in mileage between the St. Lawrence route and the all-American route is trifling, the advantage of speed through a shorter canalized portion of the St. Lawrence route would give it an advantage over the all-American route. The board of engineers of the War Department estimate the time actually consumed by the New York route as likely to be about three days' greater to Liverpool than by the St. Lawrence route. They estimate that a ship sailing between Duluth and Liverpool by the St. Lawrence route would consume 17 days in the passage, while over the all-American the passage between Duluth and Liverpool would consume 20 days. The delay in the all-American is accounted for by the slower speed necessitated by passing through a longer stretch of restricted waterway.

Let me call attention to the fact, however, that the time consumed between Duluth and New York City by the St. Lawrence route would be 12 days, as contrasted with 7½ days over the all-American route. It would take 4 days longer to go to the Panama Canal, 4 days longer to Seattle, and practically the same time to Gibraltar.

EXPORT TRADE

The chief advocates of the St. Lawrence route are the grain producers and flour millers of the great Northwest. If the proposed canal were to be used exclusively for the exportation of wheat and flour, I should frankly admit that the St. Lawrence route is superior to the all-American.

If the waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea were to be used exclusively for the carriage to Liverpool in cargo lots of automobiles, furniture, or stoves from Detroit or other western ports, I should say that the St. Lawrence route is preferable. For any cargo that is to be taken in bulk from any one port on the Great Lakes direct to Liverpool, I should admit at once that the St. Lawrence route should be selected.

If there could be profitable operation of a one-way service between the Great Lakes and Liverpool, the St. Lawrence would hold first place. Unfortunately for the advocates of the St. Lawrence route, water traffic can not succeed on a one-way basis. Unfortunately for the St. Lawrence route, water traffic to and from the Great Lakes is not confined to bulk cargoes or to export trade. A very large percentage, probably in excess of 75 per cent, of the traffic between the Great Lakes and tidewater is sure to be of package freight for domestic distribution.

WHEAT EXPORTATION

A discussion of a waterway to the sea would amount to nothing unless its possible relationship to wheat exportation is given particular attention. This I shall attempt to show.

The American wheat farmer is confident that the St. Lawrence canal will benefit him materially. He has dreams of cheap freight rates and higher home prices in consequence.

It must be admitted that every dollar saved on freight charges is a dollar made for the farmer. He will benefit directly by economies of this sort. This is true of export trade as it is of domestic.

The exigencies of the World War created an unheard-of demand for American wheat. For the four or five years before the war the exports from the United States averaged about 100,000,000 annually. In 1915 there was a jump to 332,000,000.

The war interfered with European—particularly Russian—production, a condition continuing till the end of 1923. Since that time there has been gradual improvement in foreign wheat crops. In consequence, last year, 1926, our exports fell to 106,000,000 bushels, including flour converted into terms of bushels of wheat.

But this does not tell the whole story. A study of Canadian wheat prospects is most illuminating.

In 1910 Canada planted 8,000,000 acres to wheat and exported 56,000,000 bushels. Last year she planted 25,000,000 acres and exported 324,000,000 bushels. The Dominion has 80,000,000 of the best wheat land on earth ready for wheat when there is a demand for it.

Contrast these figures with conditions in the United States. In 1910 we had 45,000,000 acres in wheat, jumped to 75,000,000 in the one year, 1919, and have settled back year by year until in 1926 we had but 50,000,000 in wheat acreage.

In short, our increase in wheat production is practically nil, while Canada has trebled her acreage and products in less than 20 years.

To me the logic of the situation is irresistible. Within a very short time the United States will disappear as a wheat exporter. Great Britain will prefer to import Canadian wheat, and the Liverpool market will be lost to us.

This situation can not be laid at the door of transportation differences. Comparisons of the freight rates and facilities of the two countries prove this.

COMPARATIVE FREIGHT RATES ON WHEAT

Duluth, in our country, and Fort William, in Canada, are the extreme western lake ports through which wheat is shipped for domestic consumption in the home country or for export to Europe. The freight rates from these two cities to the Atlantic seaboard are approximately the same.

Whether a canal is built or not, then, Americans and Canadians are on the same basis so far as water transportation is concerned. But they are not on the same competitive basis when we consider the rail rate from points of production to the lake head.

There is little difference between the rates from the Dakotas to Duluth, but Montana and other points farther west are at a considerable disadvantage. For instance, the rate from Butte, Mont., is 44½ cents per hundred, while it is only 26 cents from Alberta and Saskatchewan points. This gives the Canadian shipper an advantage of about 18 cents a bushel.

What do these figures prove? They show conclusively that the St. Lawrence waterway will not better the prospects of the American wheat farmer. He will continue to be on the present basis of competition with his neighbors across the line. As they increase their acreage the cheaper rail rates in Canada, to a considerable extent, and the sentimental tie between England and her colony, to a greater extent, will cause Canadian exports of wheat to increase while ours decline.

There is no hope, as I see it, that the digging of a canal to the sea will help the American farmer to dispose of his wheat. There is one advantage, however, although it must be shared with the Canadian wheat exporter. I refer to the possibility of loading a ship at the lake head and sending it directly to Liverpool. This will save the "fobbing" charges (elevator service, storage, brokerage, insurance, etc.) at Buffalo and New York, or in Montreal, as the case may be. Undoubtedly, a few cents a bushel might be saved in this way. This amount, added to the saving by water transportation over all rail or part rail to New York, might amount to 7 or 8 cents a bushel.

Such a saving as this is worth while, of course, but it is a saving which would follow the building of the all-American canal just as surely as it would the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway. As I see it, there is nothing in the economic aspects of the all-Canadian route to justify enthusiasm for the project above the shorter American route to the sea.

In calling attention to the better freight rates over the Canadian national railways, which are operated by the Government, it is proper to refer to the losses incurred in the operation of these lines. In 1925 this deficit amounted to $63,630,127. Were the proper proportion of this loss added to the rates on wheat there would be less advantage to the Canadian shipper.

But, no matter how it is figured, the fact remains that no waterway to the sea can possibly overcome the growing menace of Canadian competition in wheat exportation. As it is to assist the marketing of this commodity, particularly, that we have an interest in the waterway, we should face the facts as they are. To do so now will save heartburnings in the future.

THE ST. LAWRENCE A ONE-WAY ROUTE

I view the St. Lawrence route as one bound to be limited in its uses almost exclusively to eastbound traffic. Its value to Americans is confined to the advantage it offers in the exportation of bulk cargoes from the Great Lakes. If there is enough wheat to fill a ship, or if one port should have enough automobiles or any other product, to complete a cargo for Liverpool, it would go somewhat quicker, if no more cheaply, than by the American route. But that is all that can be said for the St. Lawrence waterway. For the shipping of domestic freight from the west, it has almost no value to America.

One has but to study the Montreal traffic situation to see how valueless the St. Lawrence is to the American merchant receiving goods from the east. In 1925, of the lake carriers arriving in Montreal with grain, coal, and flour, no less than 2,670 returned without cargoes. There was absolutely nothing for them to take west. These are the official figures obtained from the Lachine Canal office, Montreal, April, 1926. There need be no expectation of better conditions as a result of deepening and widening canals already in existence.

To my mind, it is absurd to think the St. Lawrence route would profit the Great Lakes ports, or the great western population of our country. A one-way water system could never pay, and this route could never be anything but a one-way system. What is produced in Europe that the mid-West wants in ship-cargo lots? Regardless of the doubtful advantages to the decreasing exportation of wheat, what else is there to expect from a through line to Europe, entering the sea a thousand miles from our own eastern and southern Atlantic seaboard?

The American railways carrying freight to and from tidewater are handling goods for domestic consumption. If I am correctly advised, 85 per cent of all the traffic is of this type.

If this is true, the only kind of a waterway which will benefit the great masses of American shippers is one which will cheapen or facilitate the carriage of freight for domestic consumption. There is but one route to serve this purpose. It is the one which coincides with present-day railway development.

There are several reasons for this statement. In the first place, any waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea will be open at best but eight months in the year. During the other four months, and usually nearly five months, the railways must be depended on as they are at present.

This being true, is it not wise to parallel the railway lines as nearly as possible? Then the same terminals at tidewater, the same brokers, the same bankers, the same offices can be used the year around. There can be no doubt, it seems to me, that satisfactory trade arrangements can be made best by such a plan.

As a Nation we have determined upon the Illinois-Ohio-Missouri-Mississippi waterway. With a policy of internal canals already established, it is illogical to go beyond our borders with another route to the sea.

MONTREAL THE BENEFICIARY OF THE ST. LAWRENCE ROUTE

There is another thing which must not be overlooked: Why take a chance on building up in a foreign country the chief North American seaport?

Montreal has grown and prospered until it has become the second port on this continent in point of freight tonnage. As I have suggested, it is the principal grain port of the world. If the St. Lawrence waterway is developed, Montreal must rush forward by leaps and bounds. It will become the chief transshipment port in North America, if the rosy prophecies of the St. Lawrence's advocates are realized.

If the Great Lakes are to become a second Mediterranean there will be mixed cargoes, in which package freight will predominate. These cargoes must be broken up and transshipped. Unless steamship lines to all parts of the world begin or end in each of the large lake ports, there will be assembled on each ship sailing from the Great Lakes to Liverpool packages which must be sent by other carriers to their respective destinations. Not every cargo can be bulk cargo. Unless confined to grain, automobiles, or some one commodity shipped in quantities large enough to fill a ship, most of them will be mixed cargoes.

This means that somewhere on the route, or in Liverpool, there must be rearrangement of the cargoes. If the freight is intended for an American port or for South America, of course the transshipment would be made before crossing the ocean.

Such transshipments would naturally be effected at tidewater, and the first such port, to which and from which sail vessels to all ports of the world, is Montreal. In this port, then, would be the breaking of cargoes, with the consequent commercial development of a great center outside the boundaries of the United States. Our national prosperity would suffer in consequence.

Canada has achieved political independence. With her new-found political and diplomatic freedom will come dreams of commercial development. Already she has perfected arrangements for a powerful steamship line to the West Indies. Mail subventions are in her hands to use and she has started on her way as a worthy competitor to the United States. For us to make possible the building of the St. Lawrence canal would be to play into her hands and to assist her proper ambitions.

Just now we are striving to build up an effective and permanent American merchant marine. Why should we lay plans to hamper it by this blow against our own shipping interests? Why build up Canada's chief city at the expense of American ports?

To give Montreal commercial supremacy on the Great-Lakes-to-the-ocean waterway would result in what? It would encourage Canadian and British steamship lines to continue their routes into the Great Lakes with a view to picking up more and more of our shipments. Inevitably American interests would suffer seriously from this invasion of our natural and national rights.

The waterway to the sea should be built where it will guarantee the use of American carriers and American ports. Otherwise, our own country will be the loser. To build the St. Lawrence canal is the first step toward the destruction of our merchant marine. It will defeat every effort to gain American supremacy on the Atlantic. As I see it, no American patriot, aware of the possibilities, could think of such a thing as the promotion of the St. Lawrence canal.

THE ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT A WATER-POWER SCHEME

There are powerful interests back of the St. Lawrence development. It is not alone the farmers of the West who are enthusiastic for the waterway because they honestly believe it will act in some mysterious way as a remedy for their economic ills. But there are other and secret influences at work to realize this project. These interests are selfish interests, interests devoted to the accretion of private wealth. They are not like the western advocates, striving for self-preservation. On the contrary, they are men who seek to corral the water-power resources of the country. They are determined that cheap electricity shall not compete with their wealth-producing properties and lessen their inflated dividends.

Frankly, I regard the St. Lawrence waterway project as a water-power scheme. The navigation feature is merely incidental to hydro-electric development.

In a speech at New Haven on March 12, Mr. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, made an urgent appeal for the construction of this route to the sea. "While the works to convert the St. Lawrence to a shipway must be on a stupendous scale—the greatest engineering project of modern history," said Mr. Hoover; and again, "but its enormous cost seemed to overwhelm its economic values." He spoke of the perfection of electric transmission, declaring that this "has made possible a large recovery of the cost of these works through the sale of 5,000,000 of horsepower which will fall over these dams."

Leaving for a moment any discussion of the significance of this statement, let me recite what Secretary Hoover said about the magnitude of this water-power resource: "It comprises the largest single source of power and one of the most economical developments on the continent."

"The development of power is a fortunate and valuable by-product," Mo. Hoover continued. "By-product" indeed! As I see it, if anything in that project is a by-product, it is the limited American navigation of the proposed waterway. See if I am not right; Mr. Hoover proved it for me when he said, "While the total cost of the works on the St. Lawrence will amount to about $600,000,000, our engineers estimate that after we deduct that portion of the works which will be taken over by the power development we are left on various estimates with a cost to the Government of from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000, which itself may some day be recovered from power."

If I am not a poor mathematician, that gives what the Secretary calls the "by-product" an investment of $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 against $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 for navigation. It looks to me like a 4 to 2, or even a 5 to 1 power project. And, in my opinion, the St. Lawrence waterway scheme is five parts hydroelectric power and one part east-bound transportation.

THE FUTURE OF THE ST. LAWRENCE WATER POWER

Nobody doubts that the great water-power resources of the St. Lawrence will be developed. Everybody knows that private commercial interests are keen to get possession of these power rights so that they can be used for the accretion of private wealth. To turn over to private parties the right to use these vast resources on long-term leases is almost as bad as giving them away outright. Unless provision is made for unfailing control over the rate making, inordinate private fortunes will result from the sale of power which belongs to the people.

What else would be done with the power feature of this development if we undertake it? Our experiences at Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam demonstrate that any other plan than farming out the power to private parties is doomed to defeat. Undoubtedly, if the Federal Government or the joint governmental body proposed by Mr. Hoover were permitted to go forward with this project, a licensee or licensees would be given the rights to operate and distribute the power. In consequence, the public would not have the benefits of markedly lower electric rates.

But by what right does Mr. Hoover expect the Federal Government or the joint American-Canadian board to take possession of power rights which belong to the State of New York and the Province of Ontario? When he proposes to pay for the St. Lawrence waterway by the sale of power, it strikes me Mr. Hoover is mighty generous with other people's money.

The power is in the St. Lawrence. It should and will be developed, but this must be done by its rightful owners. In the international portion of the stream the State of New York and the Province of Ontario, the local authorities, will do this job when the time is ripe. Our great governor has outlined the way to finance the project, and, in due time, the vast hydroelectric possibilities of the St. Lawrence will be made available to the people of the two countries. So far as my State is concerned the majority of us believe that Governor Smith's program will prevail. What this is, the ringing words of the preamble to his proposed law clearly indicate. I quote:

"It is hereby declared to be the public policy of the State of New York to preserve inalienable and in perpetuity for the use and benefit of the people the natural water-power resources of the State."

To barter away our natural resources is little short of a crime against posterity. They should be held in trust for the people and developed for the people.

In disposing of the power of the St. Lawrence and of any other natural water power, it should go first to the State and municipalities; then to farm organizations and other quasi public institutions. Private investment may provide the transmission lines, perhaps, but, from start to finish there must be such certainty of public control as to guarantee against exorbitant rates. With such a program we may be confident the humblest American home will have its electric current and can afford to use it.

Opposed as I am to the Government operation of railways, shipping, and every other business founded on inventive or commercial genius, I can not believe that the natural resources should be used for the accumulation of private wealth. There is a vast difference between the telephone, for instance, with a proper monetary return to its owners, and electric energy developed by harnessing the power of a dashing stream of water. As I see it, it would be just as proper to meter the sunlight and air as to corral the streams of the earth for the creation of private wealth.

INTERNATIONAL DIFFICULTIES

To develop the St. Lawrence involves the settlement of international questions, with constant opportunity for clashes and discord. It raises the question as to whether or not the United States can legally spend money in peace times beyond its own borders.

Canada has the Province of Quebec and the city of Montreal to satisfy. In this section is found an energetic opposition to the St. Lawrence development. The all-Canadian Georgian Bay canal has many advocates. They contend that the shorter route and national ownership are advantageous and preferable to the St. Lawrence waterway. This goes to the Georgian Bay by the Ottawa River, Lake Nipissing, and the St. Francis River, and is two or three hundred miles less distant to the Great Lakes.

Beyond this there is marked opposition to the development of hydro-electric power for export from Canada. Especially in Quebec is there a determined stand against it. Canada saw her timber cut and the lumber manufactured in the United States, particularly in Michigan. She does not intend to have great and numerous manufacturing establishments developed in America by the use of her water power. Who can blame her?

The situation is pictured by the statement of one of Canada's great economists: "The Dominion should not commit itself to an expenditure, large or small, on the St. Lawrence, whether for canals or waterways, or both, at this time." The same authority says, too, "An agreement between Canadian, American, and/or Provincial and State authorities which will avoid any future clash in their respective interests ought to be realized before a grandiose St. Lawrence power-development scheme be embarked upon."

THE ALL-AMERICAN CANAL PREFERABLE

The St. Lawrence waterway is out of the question, as I see it. It does not compare in value to the United States with the so-called all-American canal. The latter is capable of accomplishing for the Great Lakes and the West all that the St. Lawrence can give. With the one exception of three days saved on export wheat to Liverpool, the American route is superior to the Canadian.

It will run to an American port, carry domestic freight to and from the Atlantic seaboard, give the manufacturers and farmers of the West access to Central and South America, the Panama Canal, the West Coast of Africa, and the entrance to the Mediterranean. It has no dangerous fogs and deadly icebergs to contend with and is open a few more days in every year.

The all-American canal makes use of American bankers, brokers, insurance facilities, and terminals. It provides for transshipments in American ports. It leaves the money of our citizens in the pockets of Americans. It helps to develop our own United States.

There is no doubt the American canal will cost more in the beginning than the Canadian waterway. But the money for it will be spent in our own country and its control will be forever in our own hands.

As a member of the Commerce Committee of the United States Senate I have listened to the pros and cons of the argument. Many references to the lack of popularity of the New York Barge Canal were made by witnesses unfriendly to the all-American route. All the serious criticisms of the New York waterway relate to the bridges over it and their effect upon traffic. In this connection I quote ex-Gov. W. L. Harding, of Iowa, chairman of the Great Lakes-Tidewater Association. He is the chief official advocate of the St. Lawrence waterway.

On page 40 of the House rivers and harbors hearings, April 3, 1926, Governor Harding is reported to have said:

"The fact of the matter is the bridges and locks in the New York Canal are the things that keep traffic off. There is plenty of traffic there. There is no question about that, but these locks and these bridges keep ships from coming, and when you build across New York State, remember this."

Mr. Harding is right. The New York Barge Canal is so hampered by low bridges that ships capable of plying the Great Lakes and the sea can not use it. But, of course, the all-American canal we contemplate will escape this handicap. The Army engineers, and other engineers whom I have consulted, say it is only a matter of spending enough money and every obstacle can be overcome.

Here is the latest report on the subject, submitted to Congress by the Chief of the Army Engineers. On December 6, 1926, General Jadwin said:

"The route from the Great Lakes to the Hudson River is feasible, from an engineering point of view, and its construction by the United States Government would probably be justified in the near future, if the plans for the improvement of the St. Lawrence do not meet the joint approval of the legislative branches and executive heads of the two Governments."

The Army engineers in their report point out "the need for an outlet for deep-draft vessels from the Great Lakes to the sea." Apparently they fear what I have heretofore suggested, that a non-American route might result in "possible changes in centers of production and trade trends and such indirect benefits as development in manufacture and taxable property." These, they say, "might later justify the construction of this waterway across the State of New York." It is the question of money that determines their recommendation in favor of the St. Lawrence, and, as in Mr. Hoover's speech, they include in the economics of the Great Lakes to the sea project the importance of hydroelectric development.

As I have pointed out, the water-power resources must not be considered in any study of a waterway to the sea. They are not Federal property; but those who want power need not worry, because they will be developed by their rightful owners. In the last analysis, the decision of our people must be based upon the comparative merits of the two propositions as navigation projects pure and simple.

The questions before us are these:

Shall we construct a deep-water outlet to the ocean through the territory of another nation, at this time—and we hope for always—a friendly nation? Or shall we construct it through our own territory, where it will remain forever under our domination and national control?

For myself, there is but one answer. I would dig the canal from Lake Ontario to the headwaters of the Hudson. In selecting a route I should not be governed by any preconceived idea as to exactly what that route should be. But, whatever course is chosen, it will open a shipway to the Hudson. Then, I would make the Hudson River as freely open to foreign ships as is every part of the ocean. Our Canadian neighbors would be welcomed to equal privileges upon our waterway from the Lakes to the sea.

In my opinion, the American people will decide wisely if they select the all-American canal. For the sake of our economic development and for the national defense, this is the acceptable route.

RETIREMENT OF DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to know who has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the Senator if he will not continue and conclude his remarks? We would like to have the bill acted on to-night so that to-morrow we may carry out our agreement to go into executive session to consider the Esch case. If that case is disposed of to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to adjourn over until Monday; otherwise we shall be in session to-morrow and Saturday, too.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest that we stay here to-night until we get through with the pending bill.

Mr. KING. I shall conclude in a very short time, I assure the Senator.

Mr. KING resumed and concluded his speech, which is as follows:

Mr. President, I appreciate the futility of any opposition to the pending bill. There has been a nation-wide propaganda for years for a measure of this character and a large number of persons have given their support to it without appreciating its effects or understanding its consequences. It changes the entire policy which has prevailed during the life of this Republic in dealing with the questions of pensions and retirement and gives advantages to officers, not of the Regular Army, never enjoyed by volunteer or reserve officers who served valiantly in the various wars of this Republic. It discriminates against the volunteer officers of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War, and also against the ex-service men who served their country with fidelity and courage during the recent World War. It was said by one of the proponents of the bill, ex-Senator Bursum, when a similar measure was under consideration in the Senate on the 19th of January, 1925, that legislation of this character would affect only 1,000 officers, and that the total cost to the Government would be but $618,030. It is now conceded that it deals with thousands of officers, and no one can approximate the number who will be included in its provisions, or the ultimate cost to the Government. In my opinion, it will affect tens of thousands of persons and cost the Government hundreds of millions of dollars.

I may say in passing that bills carrying appropriations meet with little objection in this body, and hundreds of millions of dollars are appropriated with but slight consideration.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has just given his approval to this bill and indicates his regret that it does not include a larger number of beneficiaries in order that the appropriations called for might be greater. His position, as I understand him, is that the principles of "equality and democracy" require that all ex-service men should receive the same compensation by way of retirement as is received by officers. The application of that doctrine would call for stupendous sums. Two hundred thousand officers served in the Army during the World War, and the total war strength of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, as reported by the General Staff of the Army, was 4,800,000 men. There was 1 commissioned officer for every 20 enlisted men in all branches of the service. If each person who served in the war was to receive the retirement privileges granted by this bill to the person receiving the lowest compensation, it would cost the Government approximately $5,000,000,000 annually. I am mentioning this, Mr. President, not for the purpose of contending that those who served in the war should not be adequately compensated for the injuries and disabilities suffered by them as a result of their service. I have supported every measure providing for those who were wounded or who suffered disabilities during their service and those measures providing compensation for those who were dependent upon them. I have been unwilling to support this measure because of its manifest injustice to those who are within its terms, as well as to those who were not officers, but who served their country with equal fidelity and patriotism during the World War.

I am in favor of liberal provisions for the wounded and disabled and to support measures for the relief of the widows, orphans, and dependents of those who lost their lives in the great conflict.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is the Senator able to state the number of billions of war profits that were gathered in as the result of the war?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the question of profits made by the people of the United States during the war is not germane to the bill under consideration. However, I am willing to admit that during the World War there were large profits made by various individuals and corporations throughout the United States. Unfortunately, war, whether in our country or in other countries, affords opportunities for persons to profit at the expense of their country. During the Civil War millionaires were created. President Lincoln called attention to the war profiteers, and following the Civil War there was bitter criticism of those who had coined money out of the blood of those who died fighting for the flag. I do not justify the conduct of those who made enormous profits in their dealings with the Government in the recent war. However, there were profits made in many branches of trade and industry.

Real estate, as we know, advanced in value, and many lines of industry reaped enormous profits, although the persons and corporations engaged in such industries had no direct dealings with the Government. Prices were inflated, values went up beyond reasonable limits, and many manufacturers and middlemen made very large profits. Senators will remember that Congress laid heavy taxes upon the people, and derived billions of dollars of revenue from taxes upon incomes and excess profits. Many speculators were compelled to contribute large sums in the shape of taxes which aided the Government in its war activities.

There was a considerable advance in the prices of agricultural lands, and undoubtedly some farmers, as well as business men, derived profits during the war.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator has referred to the advance in agricultural lands. The Agriculture Department shows that Iowa land went to 213 index at the high peak. That was a little over double the pre-war value. At the same time, the index of all products of the United States was 241. So that the value of Iowa land, even in the speculation, never reached anything like the general level of prices through the country. Then the deflation came along, and now it is away below the pre-war level in value. Not only that, but these billions of war profits that went into other lines are still held, and are still charging Iowa prices for profits and return upon their investment.

Now, the Senator says——

Mr. KING. If the Senator wants to ask me a question, I will yield; but I do not want him to make a speech in my time.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I shall not do that. The Senator raised the question on me that this war-profits matter was not germane. I say it is material, and I am ready to find out how much they were; and as long as any of them are left in the hands of the men who took them I am ready to tax them and take them back to do justice to the soldiers who served in the war for the preservation of their country.

Mr. KING. The Senator is in error in assuming that I took the position that the question of war profits is not a subject of importance or a material question. However, that question is not involved in the consideration of the present bill. When we are discussing taxation and revenue legislation the question of profits received by persons and corporations becomes highly important. Nothing that I have said would indicate that it is not important to consider the service rendered to our country by those who fought for it upon battle fields. I agree with the Senator that there were many profiteers. I regret that many persons took advantage of the war to increase prices and to swell the profits of their business enterprises far beyond legitimate bounds. I appreciate that fact, and during the war and thereafter, gladly supported revenue measures that imposed heavy tax burdens upon those who were deriving large profits from their business, and whose incomes were considerable. My recollection is that I voted for an excess-profits tax which in the higher brackets was more than 80 per cent.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did the Senator in the last revenue bill vote to reduce the estate tax?

Mr. KING. No; I made the minority report against its repeal and against reduction.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am glad to know it.

Mr. KING. I believed during the war that there should be an estate tax levied, and I have taken the position since the war that under conditions existing, the estate tax should not be repealed. I believe that a large part of our revenue should be derived from income taxes and corporate taxes; and that for the time being the estates of decedents, allowing reasonable exemptions, should be taxed to meet the war burdens and the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. President, I repeat when I say that I have favored and shall continue to favor generous appropriations in behalf of those who served their country and received wounds and injuries and disabilities. I shall vote for generous pensions for their widows and dependents. I look with favor upon the provisions of the existing law which provides compensation for reserve officers and enlisted men who sustained injuries and disabilities while in the service of their country. The bill before us, however, seeks to repeal in part existing law and to give to those who served as emergency officers greater advantages and benefits than are granted to their brothers in arms who did not happen to have commissions. It has repeatedly been shown when this bill and others of similar character were under discussion that the private soldier was to be discriminated against in favor of those who held temporary commissions. Former Senator Wadsworth, of New York, one of the best friends the ex-service men have, opposed this bill and similar measures. As chairman of the Military Affairs Committee he voted against bills providing retirement privileges for the reserve officers of the Civil War. He showed in a number of speeches the injustices of such measures and the discriminations in the bill as between the beneficiaries thereunder.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] in discussing this bill has pointed out its injustices, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] has called attention to the inequalities which will result as between those who come within its provisions. He has pointed out that the bill is for the benefit of the favored few among the officers who will have the retirement privileges, but it gives but little relief to those officers in lower grades and no relief to those who held commissions as second lieutenants. The Senator gave instances showing these discriminations. As an illustration, he calls attention to the reserve officer who was a colonel and who was wounded, losing two-thirds of his leg. If a lawyer, he would receive under the bill now under consideration $29 per month, but if a physician he would receive $250 a month.

Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD at this point excerpts from an address of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], delivered in the Senate on January 19, 1925. I also ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, excerpts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 19, 1925, containing remarks by Senator Wadsworth and other Senators upon a bill containing substantially the same provisions as the one now before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The reason why the bill is essentially wrong is that it discriminates betwen enlisted men and officers, and in my judgment there is no reason in a democratic country like ours for drawing any line of distinction in compensation after the war between the enlisted man and the officer. The officer was not made an officer because he was of superior clay. He was made an officer because it was necessary in the despotism that every army is to have graded command, not because he was inherently better than the enlisted man.

Mr. BURSUM. Is it not true that he was an officer because he was found efficient at the training camp?

Mr. REED of Pensylvania. He was made an officer because he was thought to fit in the particular step in the scale of command that was needed to be filled. As for relative fitness, it takes ten times the man to be the first sergeant of a company or battery or a line regiment than it does to be a second lieutenant in the Quartermaster Corps and fill an armchair here in Washington, and yet by this bill we would give a peculiar kind of nobility, if you please, to the second lieutenant of the Quartermaster Corps in Washington and say to the first sergeant, who was in the line in France, "You are not as good as that lieutenant. You can not be compensated on the same aristocratic basis." It is all wrong. It is a slap at the enlisted man to give any such preference as this to officers.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I would like to suggest to the Senator that it seems to me to be basically wrong for this reason: The retired pay of a regular officer of the Army is necessarily a part of his compensation, a compensation from the time that he enters into the Army. He is foregoing something that he might otherwise demand, but by remaining in the Army and working for the pay fixed for his respective grades he is laying up this retired pay, so to speak. Basically, there is no foundation for giving to the emergency officer, who is brought out of civil life, where he has earned to the utmost of his capacity and up to his full merits, the same retired pay that is given to the officer of the Regular Army. That is in addition to the injustice which the Senator from Pennsylvania has pointed out.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator has mentioned a point to which I was coming in a moment. To summarize, first, I say that it is indefensible discrimination against the enlisted man of the Army. Next I say that the principle of the bill is all wrong, because it scales the compensation according to rank and not according to disability. It is answered that every workman's compensation law takes into account the earnings of the workmen and uses that in scaling the damage that is payable for an injury, but it also takes into account the degree of the injury. I say, my fellow Senators, that it is all wrong to give a slightly disabled major three times as much as we give a second lieutenant who has a bullet through his spine and is half paralyzed for the rest of his life. It is not just to grant compensation according to rank. It ought to be graded according to disability.

Mr. BURSUM. The Senator refers to a slight disability. I call the attention of the Senator that 30 per cent is the minimum, and 30 per cent certainly is no slight disability.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Relatively slight disability I should have said. Of course, a man 30 per cent disabled deserves sympathy, even if he is a major; but he does not deserve as much sympathy as the 100 per cent disabled second lieutenant of the line who got his disability in combat. I say, it is all wrong to give three times as much or twice as much to that major as would be given to that lieutenant.

One thing more about the number of officers affected by the bill. The Veterans' Bureau have told us the number that are disabled by wounds in combat, but they have not told us the number of officers who would be held to be constructively disabled by the section of the Veterans' Bureau act that we passed last June, giving constructive disability to those men who, up to the first of this year, developed any of those various diseases. That number would have to be very much larger, in my judgment, than the 1,085, or whatever the number is, the Veterans' Bureau has reported.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I regret to say that I have not been present during the discussion which has taken place this morning on the bill, and so I am not familiar with the observations thus far expressed, either in support or in opposition to it, save those observations which I have just heard expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. May I say at the outset that I feel very much as he does concerning the measure. I want to make it clear that upon two occasions the Committee on Military Affairs has reported this measure to the Senate, and that upon both occasions in the committee—I think I am violating no confidence—I opposed the measure for reasons which I shall endeavor to develop in a very few moments.

Before discussing some of the details of the problem I might make this observation: A good deal of the support enjoyed by this measure when it was first introduced, I think, came from the fact that a number of young men, upon graduating from officers' training camps in the first three or four months of our participation in the war, were given commissions in the Regular Army as contrasted with commissions in the National Army. They were young men whose superiors wanted included in the regular service and it was their idea, I have no doubt, that they would remain in the regular service through and beyond the war. Some of those young men, after securing commissions as second lieutenants in the Regular Army, were thereafter wounded, and in accordance with the statute at that time—and that statute is still upon the books—they were retired. Their number is comparatively small. But the treatment which they received under the statute turned out in a financial sense to be more generous than the treatment accorded to young emergency officers of practically the same age who served in one of the National Army or National Guard divisions, if you please.

The contrast in the treatment of those two groups, one a very large group, the emergency-officer group, and one a very small group, the young recently commisisoned regular-officer group, I think has had something to do, indeed a great deal to do, with the introduction and pressing toward passage of the bill. The argument has been made that two young men who went to an officers' training camp at the outbreak of the war should, no matter what the style of their commission be later on, receive the same treatment financially when they have become the victims of injury incurred in line of duty. There is something to be said, I will admit, upon that score, and yet when one views the situation in a broader sense I think one is impelled to the conclusion that the incident to which I have just referred is of comparative unimportance.

The bill, as I look upon it, revolutionizes our whole theory of compensation for injuries suffered in war. It reverses in very large measure the whole policy of the Government.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. Is it not true that the emergency officers of the Navy and the marines and the provisional officers were given the benefits of retirement pay for a period of something over a year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true and has often been adverted to.

Mr. BURSUM. Just one further word—and that this bill will grant no benefits except application shall be filed and received within one year, so that the proposition can not revolutionize anything any more than Congress has already revolutionized in the granting heretofore of retirement pay to the emergency officers of the Navy, marine, and provisional officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. With that I do not agree. It is true that there was attached to a naval appropriation bill, as I recollect it, a provision extending the retirement privilege to reserve officers of the Navy and Marine Corps and that that retirement privilege was exercised by them, under regulations, during and immediately following the war.

It is also true that the Senate, at least, did not debate that question and had little conception, if any at all, of its significance, but that as soon as it was ascertained what that section of the statute applicable to the Navy and marine officers meant——

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I finish, please? As soon as the meaning and significance of that section of the statute were ascertained by the Congress, in a provision of a statute which took effect two or three years after the war, they promptly stopped it by fixing an upset date beyond which no naval reserve or marine officer could be retired. * * *

* * * * * * *

I know the subject attracted a great deal of attention among Senators and at the White House. President Harding became very much concerned over the precedent set in that legislation as affecting Navy and Marine Corps reserve officers, for the papers calling for the retirement of Naval Reserve and Marine Corps reserve officers began piling up on his desk in an alarming fashion. I think President Harding was concerned about it; the Navy Department itself began to feel concerned about it; and many Members of the Senate did, with the result that, with scarcely any opposition at all, the law was repealed.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that the former retirement bill provided for general retirement on the same basis as is given to the officers of the Regular Army, while this bill, as a matter of fact, is not strictly a retirement measure except as to the compensation which is to be paid. There is quite a difference between the two propositions. The retirement given to emergency officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps, provisional officers, did not require 30 per cent permanent disability but mere unfitness for service. They received the identical treatment that is accorded to the officers of the Regular Army or the Navy. There is some difference between the two propositions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When one considers the financial side of this matter the difference is so slight that it is hard to identify. It is more in terms than in results.

Now, Mr. President, supplementing the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], I wish to call the attention of the Senate as succinctly as possible to the actual results which will follow the enactment of legislation such as this. This bill provides that every emergency officer who has incurred injuries rated in excess of 30 per cent shall receive the retired pay of the grade which he held when he was discharged from the service. For example, the pay of a first lieutenant on the retired list is $1,500 per year. An emergency first lieutenant who has been injured to the extent of 30 per cent disability would under this bill, should it be enacted into law, receive for the remainder of his life $1,500 per year. If he has suffered an injury which has been rated as 20 per cent disability, he will draw compensation under existing compensation laws at the rate of about $20 per month. It is to be remembered, and if I am wrong——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The amount is $16 a month.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am corrected by the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has studied this matter of compensation of war-time injuries. The officer in question would receive $16 a month if he were 20 per cent disabled.

Mr. FLETCHER. And more than 10 per cent disabled. I think the provision is not less than 20 per cent but more than 10 per cent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thank the Senator. His total compensation, then, would be $192 a year. Now, here are two first lieutenants, one injured to the extent of 20 per cent, who will draw $192 a year, while the other one, injured to the extent of 30 per cent—and the difference is not great—will draw $1,500 a year. Can that be defended?

How can any such discrimination as that be defended? One will draw almost eight times as much as the other, although they are men of the same age, the same rank, and the same service. How long will it take the 20 per cent man who is drawing $192 to complain against that discrimination and demand that this law, if it shall become a law, shall be amended so that the 30 per cent disability feature shall be reduced to 20 per cent and include him? It is inevitable that such a demand will arise.

Now, I have given an illustration as to men of the same rank, both first lieutenants. Let us compare men of different ranks and see how they will fare under this bill should it become law. A second lieutenant's retired pay is $1,275 per year; a major's retired pay is $2,250 per year. Let us assume that two young men, working in the same business at the outbreak of the war, go into the service. They are both sent to officers' training camps, being men of good education and being regarded as good prospects, as it were, from the military standpoint. They both graduate as second lieutenants from the same military training camp, and they may have been members of the same training company in the camp. Both see active service. Everyone knows that in war time opportunities for promotion as the result of distinguished service or excellent service come to some men that do not come to others. These two young men are commissioned as second lieutenants, but they join different outfits. One outfit may see a great deal of fighting while the other outfit may see but little fighting. The chances for promotion for those officers who are not fortunate enough, if I may use that expression in this connection, to serve in an outfit that sees service and hard fighting are greater than the chances for promotion for those officers who serve in an outfit which sees comparatively little fighting. These men have started together; they have each given up the same prospects in business life; they have made the same sacrifice; but one of them, through the fortunes of war, may be promoted rapidly while the other one may not be promoted. Both of them serve in battle, each loses an arm, but one loses it as a major while the other loses it as a second lieutenant. The major for the remainder of his life, under this bill, will draw a thousand dollars a year more than will the second lieutenant.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what would be paid to the brother of the major or the brother of the second lieutenant who was just as brave, but who fought as a private.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He would receive $100 a month if totally disabled.

Mr. KING. Why the discrimination?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not competent to rate disabilities as suggested to me. Perhaps the Senator from Pennsylvania may remind us approximately at what the loss of an arm is rated?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not remember exactly.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think it is rated at about 40 per cent under the present law. I do not think it is rated as total disability.

Mr. KING. That is immaterial to the point which I desire to bring out, namely, the great disparity between the amount which the private who fought gallantly and heroically and was wounded will receive in comparison to his brother or neighbor who happened to be an officer. I wanted to show the disparity between what the private would get and what his brother who happened to be a major or a second lieutenant or a captain would get.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the disparity is much greater as between officers and enlisted men. Thus far I have confined my discussion to the disparity between the officers.

I assume that, generally speaking, these men all made the same sacrifice when they went into the Army. They were an exceedingly intelligent, upstanding lot of young men who went into our officers' training camps during the war and who secured emergency commissions or National Army commissions. This bill sets up a system of compensation for injuries based, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has stated, upon rank, and the disparity between officers, if we are considering officers alone, is tremendous.

To be perfectly frank, Mr. President, I have received a good many letters asking my support of this measure from former officers who have much sympathy with their fellows who were severely injured. I am frank to say that when the disparity of treatment is displayed before them, at least they have hesitated in carrying on their aggressive support in favor of this measure. Some, of course, insist that it shall go through, that the disparity shall be maintained, and that the disparity is right. I can not see it in that way.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator from New York did not bring out the disparity between the payments to officers and enlisted men. He mentioned it, but did not give the same kind of illustration as he gave relative to officers. Carrying the illustration further, suppose a private or first sergeant, any enlisted man, to have lost an arm he would get about $480 a year against a major getting over $2,200 a year for precisely the same injury. Is not that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly; that is true; and those two men very conceivably—and, indeed, the statement I am about to make is generally true—those two men upon entering the service made the same sacrifice; their business prospects, their social prospects, their professional prospects were, in large measure alike, because, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, the man who rose to the rank of first sergeant of a company of Infantry or battery of Field Artillery was, to use a colloquialism, "some man."

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, this measure represents an attempt to use the retired-pay system of the regular services, which has been in operation for at least three generations, for the increase of pensions. That is what it is for; at least, that is its principal object.

Leaving aside for the moment any discussion of the merits of increasing the pension or compensation of those who have been injured—I do not intend to discuss that—I do, however, want to point out that this is the first time within my knowledge when it has been seriously proposed to use the sliding scale of retired pay as a vehicle for increasing war-time pensions; and when you use a sliding scale of compensation which is based upon rank, and rank alone—there is no other consideration in it—you are indeed revolutionizing our whole pension theory and practice.

It may be of interest to the Senate that I should read a very, very brief table showing the retired pay of officers of the several grades.

The brigadier general's retired pay is $4,500 per year.

The colonel's retired pay is $3,000 per year.

The lieutenant colonel's retired pay is $2,625 per year.

The major's retired pay is $2,250 per year.

The captain's retired pay is $1,800 per year.

The first lieutenant's retired pay is $1,500 per year.

The second lieutenant's retired pay is $1,275 per year.

These amounts represent the retired pay of officers of the Regular Army who have served less than five years. Regular Army active pay and retired pay is based upon a combination of rank and length of service. As all the emergency officers served less than five years, they would receive in the matter of retired pay the retiring pay of their respective grade given to officers of less than five years' service.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. Of course, an officer of the Regular Army who was wounded in the service in line of duty would be retired with three-fourths pay.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BURSUM. The officers under this bill would receive no greater benefit than that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not said they would.

Mr. BURSUM. I understood the Senator to say that there was a difference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; oh, no—not in that direction; none at all.

Mr. BURSUM. What is the purpose of the statement just made by the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have just read to the Senate for its information the salary schedule; that is all. I imagined that some Senators might like to know the figures.

Mr. BURSUM. What bearing has it on this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, a most distinct bearing when we consider this bill in the broad view. We are treating with an immense emergency army made up of officers and men, and you are discriminating in favor of the officer.

Mr. BURSUM. Do you not do the same thing in the Regular Army? Do you not discriminate in favor of the officer?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The retired pay of a Regular Army officer is not in the nature of a pension or a disability compensation; it is deferred salary.

Mr. BURSUM. How can it be if he is wounded in the service, and perhaps has only been in the Army a year or a day, and he goes into battle and gets wounded?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is picking out the extreme case which I myself referred to in my opening remarks.

Mr. BURSUM. Such cases occur during war times.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; there we are; just so, and I mentioned that very thing.

Mr. BURSUM. That is what this covers—war-time service; nothing else.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; this goes far beyond that in its implications and its precedent.

The retired pay given to a regular officer of the Army or Navy is not a pension. It is a deferred salary, given to him to encourage him to stay in the service at low pay all through his active years. It is given to keep the good men in the service in peace and war. The Government says to the officer: "If you will come in as a second lieutenant, we can only give you $1,700 a year. That is mighty low pay for a man who can graduate from West Point with a mental equipment of that kind. As a first lieutenant we can not give you much more than $2,000 a year. As a captain you can not get much more than $2,500 a year, and you will have to stay in the service 10 years before you can become a captain. When you get to be a major we can give you about $3,500, including your allowances, but you will have to stay at least 14 years in the service to get that far"; and many an officer has stayed in the service more than 14 years before he has reached field rank. The Government says: "Please stay in. We want you to stay in. We must have trained officers; and if you do stay in until you break down physically, either as the result of a wound or illness, in war or peace, or until you have reached the age of 64, then, when we have used you up, when you no longer can go out and earn a living because you have spent your life or sacrificed your health, in view of all these years you have served at a mere pittance, we will give you three-fourths pay as retired pay."

That is all there is to it. It is not a pension. It is deferred salary to encourage the man to stay in, whether he is hurt or not.

Mr. President, I thought that if the Senate had not already the figures it would be interested in knowing the approximate number of former emergency officers who are now receiving compensation under a rating of 30 per cent or more permanent disability. There is 1 general officer, there are 5 colonels, 12 lieutenant colonels, 71 majors, 273 captains, 374 first lieutenants, and 282 second lieutenants, the total being 1,018 officers. If those 1,018 officers received the retirement pay of their respective grades in accordance with the figures of the little table I read a moment ago, the total of such retired pay would be $1,622,700. It is to be remembered, however, that these officers are now receiving compensation under the provisions of existing law, which foots up in their cases, in the aggregate, $1,026,480. Subtracting that sum from the former sum which would be involved by the passage of this bill it will be seen that this bill will increase the annual expense of the Government in this regard by the sum of $596,220, in round figures $600,000.

Mr. KING. That is, assuming there are no additions to the roster of disabled officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. In order that we may have a true picture of it, or as complete a picture as possible, let me remind Senators that in the sentence which refers to these officers who are to be its beneficiaries, the bill reads in this fashion—

"who during such service have incurred physical disability in line of duty and who have been, or may hereafter be, rated in accordance with law at not less than 30 per cent permanent disability."

Of course, as the years come along, the number of those rated in excess of 30 per cent will increase. The passage of any such bill as this would be an immense incentive for such an increase, because, as the disability incurred by a man during the war begins to weigh upon him more as he grows older—and that is inevitable—that very disability will be rerated, upon his request.

That is perfectly natural and entirely proper. So that the man who to-day is rated at 25 per cent permanent disability will, it is safe to say, be rated in excess of 30 per cent in a very short time, and he will have an immense incentive to secure that increase in his rated disability. The difference to him in dollars and cents will be all the way from a few hundred dollars per year to a thousand or twelve hundred dollars per year, if this bill should become a law.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, whatever the construction may be, whether the Senator from New Mexico is right or the Senator from Pennsylvania is right, it is perfectly obvious that during the 12 months following the passage of any such bill as this there would be a scramble on the part of every officer rated below 30 per cent to get a rerating which would put him above 30 per cent, because it would mean literally thousands and thousands of dollars to him during the rest of his life.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I take the records of the Veterans' Bureau, which says that 1,018 officers will be affected by this act. That office is in possession of the records, and can obtain a correct survey.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have already read the figures to the Senate. That is the number of officers now rated over 30 per cent.

Mr. BURSUM. Not quite that. I do not know that that is exactly correct. I think that they estimate that there may be that number.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It says, "permanent disability rated at 30 per cent or more." I have the table in my hand, furnished to me as being official, and the number in each grade is given.

My observation is this: That the 1,018 would be greatly increased within the 12 months following the passage of any such bill as this. As I said before, there would be a scramble to get into this preferred class.

Mr. BURSUM. The director of the bureau did not seem to believe that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then he has not an accurate knowledge of human nature.

Mr. BURSUM. He has, however, a record of the physical condition of these officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BURSUM. That, of course, is the index of the extent of their disabilities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have endeavored to set forth my principal objections to this legislation. I have been familiar with it for three years. We discussed it at great length in the Committee on Military Affairs, at least in connection with two bills, this being the second bill. Upon each occasion, as I said at the outset, the majority of the committee has thought it wise and proper to report the bill favorably, and upon one previous occasion it passed the Senate, but never emerged from the House Committee on Military Affairs.

Frankly, I believe that a bad error is involved in this legislation, which would come back to plague us if we ever put it upon the statute books. When the enlisted men, who served through the last war, who are suffering disabilities in excess of 30 per cent—and they are numbered by the scores of thousands—realize that the officer of approximately their own age, and with equal prospects with them when they went into the war together, is getting two or three times as much in money from the Government for the same injury as the enlisted men they will be storming at the doors of Congress for equal treatment, and in my humble judgment, no Congress will be able to resist them.

Mr. SMOOT. Why should they resist them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; why should they resist them?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. As chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has the Senator received much solicitation from enlisted men for the enactment of this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not recollect any.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Has the Senator had any evidence that the enlisted men of the last war as a whole know that any such suggestion is pending here? I ask that because I myself have not. I have been repeatedly solicited by the officers who would be beneficiaries of the bill, but never by an enlisted man.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will say this in all frankness, that the legislative agent or the representative here in Washington of the American Legion has upon more than one occasion urged the passage of this bill. Whether the six or eight hundred thousand members of the Legion know about the bill, and what it would do, I question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have received many communications from privates registering their opposition to this bill, and the president of an organization of privates in the World War, which organization, I recall, he stated consisted of several hundred thousand members, has seen me upon a number of occasions and expressed his disapproval of the bill. He states that so far as he is advised none of those who were privates in the war favor this bill except a few who think that if the bill gets through, then they can knock at the doors of Congress and Congress will be compelled to give the privates the same relief accorded the emergency officers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the statements of Senator REED and Senator Wadsworth point out some of the fundamental objections to the pending bill. At various times during the past suggestions have been made that the volunteer and reserve officers who served during the conflicts in which our country has engaged should receive the same advantages and privileges which were accorded to regular officers of the Army and the Navy. To all these proposals the country and Congress have turned deaf ears. The distinction between those men who entered the military service of their country as young boys and dedicated their lives to such service, and those who served temporarily as reserve or volunteer officers is obvious, and it seems to me shows the unwisdom of the pending measure. The Government maintains military and naval academies for the purpose of training young men for military service. They enter these institutions as boys. The doors of opportunity in civil life are closed to them. They give their lives and all that they have to their country. The compensation given is not great, but the Government states that as deferred payment, after serving many years, they may retire upon three-fourths' pay. But after retirement they are still in the Army and subject to the call of their country.

To place them in the same category with emergency officers or volunteer officers who give but a limited period to military service and who upon leaving such service take up their former occupations or return to their pursuits in civil life, it seems manifestly unjust. Senators will remember that both in the House and Senate there have been many who served as volunteer officers in the Civil War. A considerable number of them served upon the Military and Naval Affairs Committees of the Senate and House and gave consideration to legislation dealing with the officers and ex-service men of the Civil War.

Many bills were passed in behalf of the Grand Army of the Republic. Pension measures were enacted, but at no time was there a serious demand that volunteer officers should be placed in the same situation as regular officers of the Army and Navy and receive retirement privileges provided for the latter. I repeat that if the bill before us is to be enacted into law, provisions should be made to grant to the very few volunteer officers of the Civil War who now survive, and to those who served as volunteer officers in the Spanish-American War, the same privileges and benefits that are to be given to the reserve officers who served in the World War. There must be no discrimination.

But the reserve officers of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War, so far as I know, have not believed that legislation placing them in the same category as the regular officers of the Army and Navy was justified. Senators will recall that General Grant, General Logan, Presidents Garfield and McKinley rendered service as volunteer officers in the Civil War. They did not seek retirement privileges, nor did others who served with them in that great conflict to preserve the Union.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. I just want to ask the Senator if any of the gentlemen of whom he has spoken were disabled?

Mr. KING. Not those whose names I have just mentioned; but many were disabled as the Senator knows.

Mr. TYSON. I know that; but the point I am making is that these men were not entitled to retirement, because they were not disabled.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that there were tens of thousands of volunteer officers in the Civil War, many of whom were killed and thousands of whom were disabled. Many of them sustained serious injuries. There have been Members of the Senate and House of Representatives who suffered serious disabilities during their service as volunteer officers. I know of some who lost an arm and others who lost a leg, and others who lost the sight of one eye, and many others whose disabilities were of a most serious character. None of these gallant officers received retirement privileges, nor did they seek legislation such as that being urged by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. TYSON. Not retirement, perhaps; but they got pensions very much higher than those the enlisted men got. Four times as much.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the pension system was adopted at an early day in this Republic to provide for officers and men who received injuries or suffered disabilities while engaged in military service. I believe that it is true that the officers received, as a rule, higher pensions than did the privates. As I have stated, I am in favor of granting pensions or compensation, if that term is preferred, to those who were wounded during the World War. I shall show later that Congress has dealt quite generously with those who suffered disabilities while serving their country during the World War. If the compensation which is now paid is inadequate, I shall be glad to consider the wisdom and justice of increasing the amount paid to those who were wounded and suffered disabilities in the line of duty. I am not opposing compensation to those who were injured, both officers and men. I am opposing the inequalities of the present bill, the injustices which will result and the inequalities among the officers who will be the beneficiaries under the bill, and discriminations between them and those who valiantly served as soldiers upon the battle fields.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. The pensions given officers after the Civil War were very much larger for officers than for the private soldiers, and if we were to increase the amount given to officers of the World War in proportion over what the enlisted men in the World War got it would be a great deal more than any officer would get under this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can not agree with the conclusions stated by the Senator. The Senator is attempting by this bill to rivet upon the country a system which has never been adopted by this Republic. That some officers have received larger pensions than privates, I think, is true. It may be that that can not be justified. However, the Government never adopted the policy of giving to volunteer or reserve officers the retirement privileges accorded to regular officers; but it adopted what is known as the pension system, under which officers and men receive compensation or pensions based upon the injuries received or disabilities suffered by reason of their military service. The pension system was expanded so as to provide pensions regardless of injuries or disabilities after a certain age had been reached for those who had served in the armies of their country. Upon a number of occasions following the Civil War measures were introduced in Congress which sought to give to the volunteer officers a different status and permit them to have some of the advantages provided for the regular officers in our Military Establishment. But all efforts to place the volunteer officers in the same class with the regular officers with respect to retirement failed. When an attempt was made in behalf of volunteer officers who had served in the Civil War the proposition was attacked upon the ground of discrimination, favoritism, and so forth.

Senator Grimes stated that the country was willing to pay the officers pensions and he supposed "that Congress was disposed to increase the pensions if they are not able to support themselves upon what we already give them." Senator Harris stated:

> If I understand it the effect of the provision will be simply to select a number of officers of the Veteran Reserve Corps who may immediately and probably will be very soon placed upon the retired list and place a number of wounded officers now out of the service upon the retired list to receive pay as officers of the Army.

As I have indicated, this proposition was defeated as were others of a similar character. I recall the pathetic case of Capt. Charles P. Johnson of the Iowa Volunteers. He was shot through the hips and internally injured in such manner as to keep him lying prone on his face continually thereafter. A bill was offered in 1868 to grant him a pension but there was no thought of placing him upon the retired list.

When an effort was made to place General Shields who had been a brigadier general during the Mexican War and during the Civil War, upon the retired list, it was opposed. Senator Oglesby, himself a veteran of both wars, stated that there were thousands who had rendered efficient and patriotic service who were disabled. He was unwilling to place General Shields, worthy and patriotic as he was, upon the retired list. His position was, in effect, opposition to the application of the retirement system to the volunteer officers.

Senator Edmunds, after briefly stating the existing retirement law, expounded the theory of retirement as follows:

> What is the principle upon which that statute is founded, which has established this retired branch of the Army of the United States and into which it is proposed to put * * * soldiers * * * who do not now belong to the Army? That principle plainly is * * * that when a citizen of the United States devotes his life to the business of the military service of his country and has spent 30 or 40 years of service to it, having no other occupation, having given up his whole career to that one service, when old age comes upon him shall not be dismissed from the service but may be placed upon this retired list and relieved from active duty; or when, having devoted his life to the regular military service of his country, he has become incapacitated * * * he may be retired. * * * We have provided for the volunteer soldiers of the United States, when they have been disabled in the service of their country, pensions, liberal pensions, * * * not too liberal for their deserts in some respects; probably not liberal enough in respect to some classes of persons whose capacity to do anything had been entirely destroyed by wounds received in the service. * * * General Shields has a pension, * * * and yet you propose to foist him into a branch of the public service with which he has no connection, and which is founded upon a principle that does not apply to him at all.

The subject of retirement for volunteer officers was considered by Secretary of War Lindley M. Garrison. In 1914 he opposed the application of the principles of the retirement bill to volunteer officers and gave some of the reasons justifying the conclusion which he reached. He stated that the privileges of the retired list of the Regular Army constitute a consideration granted by the Government for the consecration of lives to military service. He states that the military relations requires the officer to give up ambition which is the rightful portion of every man in the world, "and for a measure of compensation which does not exceed what is barely sufficient to maintain himself and family in the status which the military service demands." His position was that the measure then being considered, if enacted, would constitute a direct step toward "grafting upon our military policy the principle of retirement rather than pensions for our volunteer forces, both officers and enlisted men, the result of which would be an almost insupportable burden on our people."

Mr. President, the letter of Secretary Garrison presents the arguments against a measure of the character under discussion in so clear a manner that I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD without reading, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

APRIL 20, 1914.

DEAR MR. HAY: The accompanying bill, H. R. 1851, Sixty-third Congress, first session, referred to the Secretary of War for further information and remark, is herewith returned. This bill was previously referred to the War Department, and on that reference the information desired was as to the probable number of beneficiaries of this proposed legislation and the annual cost of paying the same. It was returned by letter of the Acting Secretary of War, dated March 26, 1914, inclosing a memorandum prepared by The Adjutant General of the Army giving the information required by the reference as accurately as could be furnished.

The beneficiaries of the bill are the surviving commissioned officers of the volunteer forces of the Civil War period. I desire to preface my remarks on this bill with the statement that they are not to be construed as in any sense antagonistic to any proposition to bestow adequate rewards upon this class. They rendered their service in a trying period of our history, and pursuant to the dictates of patriotism—services which can not be measured in terms of financial reward. My objection to the bill goes not to the amount of the reward but to its character, and I shall make my objection clearer by a brief reference to which I conceive to be the purpose for which a retired list for the Regular Army is provided.

The privileges of the retired list of the Regular Army constitute a consideration granted by the Government for the consecration of lives to its military service and the volunteering for life for such service in any exigencies that may arise, whether in peace or war. The military relation requires the officer to give up ambitions which are the rightful portion of every man in the great world outside, and for a measure of compensation which does not exceed what is barely sufficient to maintain himself and family in the status which the military service demands; and the law has said that when he serves a prescribed period of time, or has reached a certain age, or is disabled by injury or disease incident to the service, he must withdraw from active service and give way to a younger man better fitted for the rigors of military life. As the officer has not been trained for a business career or for any career in civil life, he finds himself at the end of his service, certainly in the vast majority of cases, not only without a profession but without a competency.

Prior to 1861 we had no retired list for the Regular Army. In that year Congress, in recognition of the conditions above described, established such a retired list. It was in no proper sense a pension list. The officer by his retirement was withdrawn from active service, but was still retained as a part of the Army, subject to its laws and to trial by military courts, and to be called upon to perform such duties as were within his ability. His obligation to render such service is expressed in the concluding provision of the act creating a retired list in the following terms:

"SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That retired officers of the Army * * * may be assigned to such duties as the President may deem them capable of performing, and such as the exigencies of the public service may require." (12 Stat. 287.)

It has been the effect of subsequent amendatory legislation to require the consent of the retired officer in his detail to active duty, except in case of war. In the excepted case it is provided:

"That in time of war retired officers of the Army may, in the discretion of the President, be employed on active duty, other than in the command of troops, and when so employed they shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grades." (30 Stat. 979.)

Under existing law many retired officers are detailed to active duty; some as instructors at military schools, others on militia duty, recruiting duty, as attachés, or on staff duty not involving service with troops. A large number of retired officers will undoubtedly be called into service, with or without their consent, in the event of war.

Congress has thus far restricted the privilege of retirement to members of the permanent Military Establishment—that is, to those only who have consecrated their lives to the military service. This is true not alone of the officer, but of the enlisted man, who may retire only when he has served a sufficient time to indicate that he has adopted the military service as a life career. To those who have thus pledged their services for life to the Nation, in peace or in war, Congress, as a matter of keeping faith with them, has provided by law that they shall be secure in their calling throughout their lives and, when they have performed what is deemed a life service, shall be relieved of some of the active duties of service and be permitted a living pay for the remainder of their lives. This basic principle of our retirement laws is recognized in an opinion rendered June 10, 1898, by the Solicitor General, Richards, with the approval of Attorney General Griggs. In discussing the applicability of laws relating to the Regular Army to the then existing volunteer forces, the Solicitor General said:

"Chapter 2 of Title XIV, providing for the retirement of Army officers, clearly has no application to the Volunteer Army, organized for simply temporary service. This chapter creates two lists of Regular Army officers—the active and the retired list—a distinction which does not obtain in the Volunteer Army. When, therefore, section 1222 places a restriction on every 'Army officer on the active list,' it plainly refers to Regular Army officers. An Army officer on the active list is one not only actively but permanently engaged in the military service of the Government. Having chosen the Army for his career, and being actively engaged therein, the statute properly prohibits him from accepting or exercising the functions of a civil office.

"While an officer in the Volunteer Army may be said to be actively engaged in the military service, he is not permanently so engaged. He is called out to meet an emergency and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer, he has not selected the military service for a profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects when the war is over to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need nor demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence and on his return resume his former work."

It is to be noted further, as justifying this special provision for members of the permanent establishment, that they not only remain liable to call for active service, but suffer a certain impairment of citizenship rights which is incident to their military relations.

From what has been said above it will be apparent, I think, to your committee that the object sought to be attained by this bill and the object for which the retired list of the Regular Army is maintained are widely different. The object of this bill is to reward men who have rendered military service for a specific period and for a specific purpose, but who have no subjection to military law, no obligation to render military service, and who are under no impairment of citizenship rights; while the object of the Regular Army retired list is to reward men who have consecrated their lives to that service and under military jurisdiction, and who do suffer a degree of impairment of citizenship rights incident to the military relation they retain after retirement. The retirement privileges of the regular officer and soldier constitute an inducement held out by the Government to men to adopt the profession of arms as a life career.

The proposed bill violates, as I see it, this basic principle of our retirement laws. I deprecate any departure whatever from that principle, even to the extent proposed in the pending bill. The retired volunteer list proposed to be created by it would inevitably become confused in the public mind with the retired list of the Regular Army. If enacted it will constitute a direct step toward engrafting upon our military policy the principle of retirement rather than pension for our volunteer forces, both officers and enlisted men, the result of which would be an almost insupportable burden to our people.

In conclusion I invite your attention to the letters of my predecessor, Secretary Stimson, of April 26 and August 8, 1912 (copies of which are inclosed herewith), expressing his disapproval of a similar bill at that time pending before Congress.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON, Secretary.

HON. JAMES HAY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the Sixty-ninth Congress a measure was introduced which sought to give retirement privileges to volunteer officers who had served in the Civil War. The matter was investigated by Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, and in a report submitted by him on the 9th day of May, 1917, to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, he stated his objections to the bill. Among other objections he said that if the bill were enacted into law it "was reasonably certain that measures would be demanded for the benefit of the volunteer officers of the war with Spain and those belonging to the National Guard who had rendered or were then rendering Federal service, as well as officers of the present Military Establishment, but who were not permanent officers."

I ask that excerpts from his report be inserted in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Upon investigation of the matter I have ascertained that several measures of practically the same import as the one under consideration have been introduced in Congress during recent years and that such of those measures as have been referred to this department for its views with regard to the proposed legislation have been acted upon adversely by my predecessors in office.

Without going into any analysis of the bill now under consideration with a view to the consideration of its probable effect, cost, etc., I wish to state that I concur in the adverse view of my predecessors concerning any legislation such as that proposed. Perhaps there is no one who appreciates more fully than I do the great service rendered our country by the men who served as officers in the Civil War or one who is more in favor of granting them all the rewards, financial and otherwise, which the valiant service they rendered merits. But I do object most emphatically to the use of the retired list of the Army or any similar device, be it designated a "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list" or otherwise, as a means of rewarding officers who have had volunteer service only.

Any such plan as that proposed in the present bill would, if adopted, engraft upon our military policy the principle of retirement rather than that of pension for volunteer officers. Furthermore it would very greatly increase the financial cost of our Military Establishment and for a purpose which, in my opinion, should not be chargeable to the Military Establishment at all. The real effect of the proposed measure, if it were to be enacted into law, and practically the only effect, would be to increase the pensions now allowed by law to volunteer officers of the Civil War period. If the pensions which are now allowed such officers under the terms of existing law are deemed by Congress to be inadequate it would seem that no effort to bring about an increase thereof should be sought by the indirect method of establishing the "list" authorized by the proposed measure, but that legislation with that end in view should be embodied in a pension measure, pure and simple, without any such objectionable feature as that pointed out hereinbefore.

Furthermore, if the bill under consideration were to be enacted into law for the benefit of men who served as volunteer officers in the Civil War, it is reasonably certain that it would be followed by other measures for the benefit of volunteer officers of the war with Spain, of officers belonging to the National Guard who have rendered or are now rendering active Federal service, and of officers of the present war not belonging to the permanent Military Establishment. It would seem that the precedent established by the enactment of such legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of one war should, in common fairness, be followed in time by similar legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of all wars. It can be readily seen that the expense involved in any such legislation would be enormous.

But the greatest objection to the proposed measure, so far as the War Department is concerned, is that it proposes in the guise of a retired list bill to bestow rewards for military service upon volunteer officers. As already suggested, if it be the intention of Congress to bestow such rewards it would seem that they should be granted directly by pension or similar legislation instead of indirectly by the very objectionable plan embodied in the pending bill which, in my opinion, should not be enacted into law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this subject was considered by John W. Weeks when Secretary of War. He made a number of reports upon measures similar to the bill now before us and consistently opposed their enactment. He marshaled the reasons against such measures, and it seems to me his position has never been successfully challenged.

In a letter which he wrote to Capt. Victor Heintz, of the Republican National Committee, May 4, 1921, he directs attention to one feature of this matter that is highly important. He states that the law relating to compensation of emergency personnel, which was enacted before the emergency officers accepted their commissions, makes no distinction between commissioned officers and enlisted men of the emergency forces as to disability compensation. He states that the commissioned officers understood these conditions when they accepted their commissions and as a matter of fact were glad to accept them under these conditions. Senators will see the pertinency of this statement made by Secretary Weeks. During the debate the point has been emphasized that the reserve officers and enlisted men come from the people. Those who were privileged to become officers were subject to the draft the same as privates, and it was the view throughout the Nation that it was to be a democratic army, with no privileges or advantages to be secured by the emergency officers over their brothers and friends who came from the same walks of life and who were to fight for their country with no less zeal and patriotism than those who happened to obtain commissions.

Mr. President, Senators know that in many cases two brothers volunteered for the war, one being fortunate enough to be sent to the officers' training camp or get a commission, the other serving in the ranks. The cases are numerous where the brother serving in the ranks was wounded or was killed on the battle front. The brother who held a commission, perhaps, did not leave American soil. Perhaps he served in a clerical capacity or performed duties far removed from the field of danger. He may, like many others, both within the Army and in private life, have suffered from the influenza or some other ailment which resulted in some disability. The brother upon the battle front may have received a serious wound, resulting in a 60 per cent disability. Because he was a private he receives compensation allowed by law, but his brother suffering a 30 per cent disability and who held a commission as a captain or a major would receive, for life, if this bill becomes law, three or four times as much as by way of compensation as the wounded brother.

If this bill should become law, it will provoke resentments that can not be allayed or extirpated. It will lead to demands by the ex-service men who did not receive commissions that they receive the same benefits, rewards, and privileges as their brothers and friends who happened to obtain commissions.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the letter from Secretary Weeks, to which I have just referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 4, 1921.

Capt. VICTOR HEINTZ,
Republican National Committee,
Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CAPTAIN: I have before me your letter, dated April 20, 1921, concerning the proposal to obtain retirement privileges for disabled emergency officers who served during the World War. Before proceeding with the reply thereto I desire to tell you that I am sorry I did not see you when you called, and assure you that I hope to be less pressed for time at the next opportunity you may have to come to my office.

In connection with your letter I wish to assure you that I have made a careful study of the contents thereof and the problem involved, which required a thorough investigation as to the viewpoint of the War Department pertaining to the proposed legislation to which you refer. As a result of my perusal of this subject, I am convinced that the remedy to be sought in this matter does not properly pertain to a question of retirement, but it does fall under one of adequate compensation. I am not prepared to admit that the war risk insurance act does not provide adequate compensation to all disabled officers and enlisted men who come within its provisions, but I feel that if the war risk insurance act and subsequent acts amendatory thereto do not provide adequate compensation our efforts should be devoted to securing a further amendment to that act, as it is the law which was designed to meet the needs of all who served in the Army or Navy during the World War, as well as the temporary officers to whom you refer. On the other hand, the laws pertaining to retirement are separate acts necessary and essential to the War Department if it is to secure suitable types of officers for the Regular Army and induce them to continue permanently in the profession of arms by providing an inducement that it will care for them should misfortune overtake them and will assure adequate protection during their old age.

It is the opinion of the War Department, with which I concur, that the cost of a measure such as has been proposed and is now under consideration would be far in excess of the figures that you conclude to be maximum. In this connection it must be borne in mind that the available field from which it is possible such retirement might be drawn is about 200,000 officers alone, and if such legislation pertaining to officers is enacted it is apparent to me that the enactment of such legislation would with equity eventually necessitate the enactment of further legislation providing for a like increased compensation for all enlisted men who served during the World War, as otherwise undoubtedly there would exist unjust discrimination against such enlisted men and in favor of the emergency officer. In fact, many enlisted men apparently feel themselves entitled to retirement and retired pay as officers. In some cases the War Department has been urged to give noncommissioned officers appointments as officers and to place them on the retired list as such. The basis of such claims is, in general, that due to casualties the noncommissioned officer was thrown into the position and command of an officer and, while so serving, incurred wounds or disability. Such occurrences are common in active operations; in fact, many cases have been presented in which privates have assumed command of platoons and companies. The claims of such men, or the expense incident to them, can not be overlooked if a principle is to be adopted of basing retirement and retired pay on the rank or office held in the Army. Equity in this matter would also eventually necessitate the enactment of some legislation such as is contemplated in Senate bill 991, Sixty-seventh Congress, which has for its objects the appointment and retirement of those persons who served in the Volunteer Armies of the United States in the Civil War, the war with Spain, and the Philippine insurrection in the ranks held by them during such service.

In connection with this question due consideration should be given to the unsuitability of the retirement laws for the purpose. For reasons which you can easily appreciate the retirement law applicable to the professional soldier of the Regular Army causes his retired rank, and consequently his pay, to be proportional to his length of service. It takes no account of the degree or nature of his disability. Essentially, and in theory, the existing scheme of retired pay for officers of the Regular Army constitutes, in effect, a system of deferred payments for and in consideration of a lifetime of military service under a life contract between the officer and the Government, payable after inception of the statute—fixed period of unfitness for military duty, and in the relatively small number of cases of premature disability retirement, payable in equitable specific performance by the Government of its monetary obligation in consideration of the aforesaid life contract of officer, in the performance whereof the disability occurred.

It is not believed that the retirement proposed would be a fair system of compensation for persons who were in the military service but temporarily during the war. All such persons come into the military service practically on an equality. The remuneration which they should receive for disability should be in accord with the degree of their disability and the extent to which it impairs their earning power, rather than to be based upon accidents of the service. The proposed Johnson bill would not only create an unjustifiable discrimination between officers and enlisted men who served during the war, as I have pointed out in the foregoing, but would also discriminate among the officers themselves. These officers were given varying ranks when they came into the Army and such rank was subject to change due to accidents of promotion. It does not appear, for example, just that two officers of the same length of service and suffering from equal disability, one of whom happened to be a major and another who happened to be a first lieutenant, should receive different compensations for their disabilities.

It should be well understood in this matter that the War Department is in no way opposed to proper and adequate compensation to persons who served during the war. It is merely opposed to the manner in which it is proposed to grant such compensation, this matter placing a burden of expense upon the Army which does not belong there, in addition to making unjust discriminations among the persons who came in for temporary service during the war. The War Department realizes the necessity for economy in making appropriations, and it also realizes that appropriations for the pay of retired officers will always be considered a charge against the Army. It is the duty of the War Department to take all possible and reasonable steps to bring about a reasonable degree of preparedness for the Nation. This preparedness necessarily involves the expenditure of funds. A charge against the Army for the compensation of persons who have served in past wars would undoubtedly tend to give a false idea of the cost of the Military Establishment and would tend to discourage the appropriation of funds that are needed to bring about the degree of national defense for which the War Department feels it will be held responsible.

Concerning the law which provided for the retirement of officers of the Naval Reserve Force and the temporary officers of the Navy, to which you refer, I see, of course, the point you make, but in this connection the number of officers retired under the provisions of that law is by comparison so small in connection with the number that would ultimately become eligible to retire under the provisions of the Johnson bill or similar bills that the War Department, in view of this fact, and the other important considerations which I have touched upon, is firmly of the conviction that legislation such as that herein discussed is not legislation which will be for the best interests of the Government should it be enacted.

It should be remembered when comparison is made between the emergency officer and the regular officer during this war that practically all of the junior officers of the Regular Army were commissioned in advanced grades as temporary officers during the war. In fact, some first lieutenants held the temporary grades of colonel; yet, under the existing law for the Regular Army, when such officer was disabled he is retired not as a colonel but as a first lieutenant.

It should also be remembered that the law relating to compensation for emergency personnel, which was enacted before the emergency officers accepted their commissions, makes no distinction between commissioned officers and enlisted men of the emergency forces as to disability compensation. The commissioned officers understood these conditions when they accepted their commissions, and as a matter of fact they were apparently glad to accept them under these conditions. Most of them, especially the junior officers, were subject to the draft, and many of them would have been drafted as enlisted men had they not volunteered and qualified as commissioned officers. It is, then, a question about which I have in my mind a great deal of doubt as to whether any distinction should be made in regard to benefits that should be given to the temporary commissioned officers from that which is given to the temporary enlisted men. Certainly, it was perfectly clear in the minds of Congress when it enacted the laws that there should be no distinction.

My view of the matter is that the Government has entered into contracts with the personnel of the Regular Army as well as with the officers to whom you refer, and that these contracts vary in character, but that under them the Government has performed its full duty with respect to the personnel of both classes when it has fulfilled these contracts. I believe that the Government can afford to be generous toward any special cases concerning which it is shown that the rights accruing under such contracts have not been fulfilled, and as I have herein indicated the War Department will look with favor upon any reasonable and necessary modifications of the war risk insurance act as amended, if the law established thereby does not provide the generous compensation I have mentioned.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KING. Secretary Weeks, in the report which he submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate on May 9, 1921, opposes the retirement bill which was submitted and which was substantially the same as the bill now before us. He states that he concurs in the adverse views of his predecessors concerning legislation of the character proposed. While expressing his appreciation of the service rendered by the men who served in the military forces of the United States in time of war, he emphatically objected to the "use of the retired list of the Army as a means of rewarding officers who have had volunteer service only." Continuing he says:

Any such plan as that proposed in the bill under consideration would, if adopted, engraft upon our military policy the privilege of retirement rather than that of pension for volunteer officers. Furthermore, it would very greatly increase the financial cost of our Military Establishment and for a purpose which, in my opinion, should not be chargeable to the Military Establishment at all. The real effect of the proposed measure, if it were to be enacted into law, and practically the only effect, would be to increase the pensions now allowed by law to volunteer officers of the Civil War, Spanish-American War, and the Philippine insurrection period. If the pensions which are now allowed such officers under the terms of existing law are deemed by Congress to be inadequate, it would seem that the proper way to bring about an increase thereof should not be sought by the indirect method authorized by the proposed measure but that it should be obtained by legislative action on pension measures, pure and simple, without any such objectionable feature as that pointed out hereinbefore.

Another objection to the proposed measure is that it proposes, in the guise of a retirement bill, to bestow rewards for military service upon volunteer officers. The retired list exists for the sole purpose of enhancing the efficiency of the Regular Army by providing for the retirement of its officers. It is not intended, and should not be used, as a means of pensioning persons who have served the Government at some time in either a military or civil capacity.

Elihu Root, when Secretary of War, had occasion to examine this subject, and when opposing a bill to place a volunteer officer who had served in the Civil War upon the retired list, stated that by so doing it would "reverse the previous policy of Congress in these matters and establish a very bad precedent." He further stated in his report to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, March 21, 1902, that the effect of the passage of this bill would simply be to give the persons named special pensions grossly disproportionate to their deserts. Under the pension rates now in force for disabilities incurred in the military service, a lieutenant colonel, colonel, or general officer can receive but $30 per month for total disability, a captain but $20, a first lieutenant but $17, and a second lieutenant but $15. A veteran officer who had lost both hands or both feet or both eyes in battle can receive but $72 per month. The effect of passing this bill would be to give to the persons named therein, who have no such disability, who have not the shadow of a claim to stand upon, a footing superior to such disabled veterans as recipients of their country's bounty, pensions for the remainder of their lives, ranging from $103.12 to $218.75 per month, aggregating for the 24 persons named, $3,320.60 per month.

Both upon its specific demerits and as a matter of general policy, the bill is highly objectionable.

Adjt. Gen. H. C. Corbin on March 19, 1902, in a report to the Secretary of War expressed his disapproval of a bill referred to the War Department, which authorized the President to place upon the retired list of the Army a number of ex-volunteers who had served in the Army during the Civil War and the War with Spain. He stated that the retired list of the Army was created for regular officers of the Army disabled by wounds or sickness incident to their service therein or required to be retired by length of service or by reason of age. He further stated that it would be—

Very unwise and detrimental to the best interest of the Army to change the nature of the retired list so that it shall become a special pension list for either regular or volunteer officers who have been legally discharged or separated from the service.

His report further proceeds:

A very large number of volunteer officers were, as is well known, completely disabled by wounds or sickness during the Civil War, many of whom have since died and very many of whom are still living. These have been provided for, to the extent which Congress deemed advisable, by the pension laws. If the conditions are such that ex-volunteer officers seeking relief are entitled to relief beyond that given by the pension laws, there can be no objection on the part of the War Department to legislation granting them liberal pensions. To appoint and place them on the retired list of the Army would be precisely equivalent in cost to the Government to granting them pensions equal to the retired pay they would receive on being so appointed, as no duty whatever is exacted of retired officers. Congress has repeatedly and uniformly declined to pass special laws to place on the retired list of the Army ex-volunteer officers who never held commissions in the Regular Army, and in the few cases in which special laws have been passed to reappoint and place on the retired list officers who had rendered service both in the Regular Army and Volunteers, the uniform principle applied in considering such bills was to give no higher rank on the retired list than the officer formerly held in the Regular Army.

Mr. H. L. Stimson, when Secretary of War, in a communication addressed to Representative Dudley M. Hughes, concerning H. R. 7028, Sixty-second Congress, first session, stated that the retired list—was established and maintained for the benefit of the officers of the Regular Army who have spent the best part of their lives in the service of the Government, or been disabled in the line of duty, and who are thereby prevented from engaging in civil pursuits with a view to providing for themselves and families during their declining years.

Mr. Stimson further proceeds:

A retired list for officers and men of the Regular Army, as provided under existing law, is necessary for the maintenance of the Army, and its continuance should be safeguarded by limiting admission to it to those who are embraced by the provisions of existing laws governing retirements. A departure from this general principle will tend to establish a precedent which may eventually endanger the continuance of the retired list.

Mr. President, I have received a number of letters from ex-service men who were not officers, protesting against measures similar to the one before us. When the Bursum bill was under consideration—and it provisions were substantially the same as the bill now being considered—I received a letter from an organization of ex-service men. I ask permission that the letter be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS PRIVATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OFFICE OF THE NATIONAL PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C., February 2, 1925.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Private Soldiers and Sailors' Legion most earnestly protests against the adoption of a bill now before the Senate (S. 33) providing for the retirement of disabled emergency officers on terms identical with those which accompany the retirement of officers of the Regular Army.

This proposed measure is grossly discriminatory against the enlisted men. It is only in rare and most unusual circumstances that Regular Army officers are retired until they have served extended terms.

It should be further pointed out that this assurance of retirement and protection for officers who become incapacitated in the service of their Government is absolutely essential to the maintenance of a high efficiency among the Regular Army officer personnel. When men enter the profession of arms to make it their life work, they must have reasonable assurance that when they are no longer fit for that service or any other the Government will stand between them and financial want.

For emergency officers, some of whom served but brief terms with the colors, to ask for treatment on a parity with that of officers of the Regular Army seems to this organization of enlisted men to be highly inappropriate to say the least.

Were the bill now before your honorable body to become a law, an emergency officer with the rank of captain who is 30 per cent disabled would receive from the Government for the remainder of his life a fixed income of $200 per month.

As the law now stands all disabled veterans of the World War other than officers of the Regular Army are entitled to compensation on an equal basis, without discrimination as to rank. A former captain 30 per cent permanently disabled and a former private 30 per cent permanently disabled are each entitled to compensation from the Veterans' Bureau at the same rate—$24 a month—subject always to revision by the Veterans' Bureau, but the former captain, suffering no greater disability, would become entitled to three-fourths of a captain's pay and allowance for life, amounting to something over $200 a month, and not subject to any revision if this bill should become a law.

On the other hand, the emergency officer has something for which he has not paid and to which he is not entitled.

It may be pointed out in this connection that when they entered the war the status of the officer and enlisted man may not have been markedly different. It may even be that the officer suffering 30 per cent disability may be in every respect better able to care for himself than the enlisted man.

The bill does not provide that those who served bravely and well, or that those who made sacrifices or suffered unusual hardships shall be correspondingly rewarded. It provides that those who were officers shall be rewarded because and only because they were officers. We served under these officers and we know that their service as such compared to the services of the enlisted men do not entitle them to any special preferment.

Why, then, should the Government, through any mistaken idea of its duty to its emergency, discriminate against them in a manner that would be discriminatory against the millions of enlisted men who had hoped that classes that were necessary during the warfare would disappear when peace was restored?

We further direct your attention to the recent action of your honorable body on the so-called "bonus" bill with the object of pointing out to you that in preparing this measure there was no thought of discriminating between officers and enlisted men.

Indeed, it has been urged throughout the long-continued discussion of the bonus subject that officers, for reasons that seemed obvious, should not be included in legislation that ostensibly sought only to measurably compensate the soldiers for economic losses sustained during—and not after—the war.

May we say that to the enlisted man the loss of an arm, leg, eye, or some other vital member is just as vital, just as disabling as would be the loss of a similar member by an emergency officer.

This bill, S. 33, if enacted into law will eventually cost the Nation millions of dollars and add to the already overburdened taxpayer.

The war is over, and men are to-day rated neither as officers or enlisted men. Those who were disabled are simply citizens, entitled to the most generous consideration that the Nation can give them.

But this consideration, when bestowed, should be upon a basis of absolute equality. The distinction they obtained during the war disappeared when the emergency army was demobilized.

We assert that there is warrant neither in justice nor fairness for the discrimination that is proposed by a bill that establishes a difference in the dispensation of governmental relief to those who served it to their best ability and at their serious physical sacrifice.

The adoption of this bill is being urged by the controlling officials of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, all former officers, but the opinion of the enlisted personnel of these organizations, as far as this bill is concerned, has never been sought. On the contrary, the men assuming to voice the opinion of the enlisted membership of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars have never dared inform their members of the purpose of this bill or of their activities in support of it. We know enough of the attitude of former enlisted men to justify us in stating that the enlisted membership of both the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars is practically unanimously opposed to the adoption of this bill. Our membership is a unit in opposing it.

The Private Soldiers and Sailors' Legion earnestly appeals to your honorable body not to give its approval to a measure that would be provocative of widespread dissatisfaction and discontent and which would be a complete and emphatic denial of that equality which is the cornerstone of our Republic.

Respectfully submitted.

MARVIN GATES SPERRY,
National President.

Mr. KING. Among the letters which I received protesting against the bill is one from which I desire to read a few paragraphs:

Under this bill these temporary officers are to receive:

* * * all hospitalization privileges and medical treatment as are now or may hereafter be authorized by the United States Veterans' Bureau * * * (everything the other beneficiaries receive) and, in addition, instead of compensation based upon degree of disability, whenever they have a rating of 30 per cent permanent disability, they shall receive:

"* * * retired pay at the rate of 75 per cent of the pay to which they were entitled at the time of their discharge from the commissioned service * * *."

And this preferred treatment, as a practical matter, is to be at the expense of the other beneficiaries of the World War veterans' act, for it is provided:

"That all pay and allowances to which such persons or officers may be entitled under the provisions of this law shall be paid solely out of the military and naval compensation appropriation fund of the United States Veterans' Bureau * * *."

For a 30 per cent permanent disability, for which the private and first sergeant or sergeant major receive each $30 a month, it is proposed to give these second lieutenants a minimum of about $125 per month for life, and higher commissioned officers higher pay in proportion, whether they need it or not. It is contended that this preferred treatment is necessary as a matter of justice. What do they mean by justice?

When war was declared men came forth from all walks of life to answer to the Nation's call. Each sacrificed his calling in private life and responded to the call—each served to the best of his ability. For example: In a certain small town with which the writer is familiar its two brightest young men, college graduates, served as privates. They are to-day college professors. It so happened that its sole officer was one of the town's distinctly poorer specimens. But these things are immaterial. It was a common cause in which each gave of the best he had, and freely. The degree of the sacrifice that each made was not determined by the rank he held. Both officers and men suffered alike the hazards of war, and Congress wisely and in all fairness said that the only just and equitable way of treating the disabled men was to grant to each, without preference or prejudice, compensation in accordance with the degree of the disability he had suffered. There was no distinction or difference in sacrifice, and there should be none in treatment.

When the war was over these officers and men alike, wherever necessary and practicable, were granted courses of vocational rehabilitation to prepare them again to earn a living in civil life. They were trained in the professions, the trades, and in business, and are now receiving, besides, compensation based on the degree of their disability.

Take this for an example of what can be duplicated in practically any community: When war was declared two young men were clerking in a drug store side by side and at the same pay. They both enlisted. One became a sergeant major; the other a second lieutenant. Both suffered a 30 per cent permanent disability in line of duty. Both were given medical courses at the same medical college. Both are to-day practicing physicians with offices together. And both are receiving $30 a month compensation. It is the contention of the advocates of this Bursum bill that this equality in treatment is rank injustice. The doctor who was formerly a second lieutenant, and received more money while so serving than he had ever received before in his life, should receive about $125 per month for life for his disability—he should be granted preferred treatment at all times, and be taken out of the class with his fellow physician, who should continue to receive the $30 per month. Is that justice? Then deliver us from it.

One of the arguments for asking for this preferred treatment is that the disabled officers of the Regular Army are retired on three-fourths pay. (But with no vocational training.)

There is good sound reason for providing for the retirement of officers of the Regular Army at three-fourths of their regular pay in case of disability. These men enter a profession for life in which the remuneration will be far less than they could earn in civil life, and which does not fit them for immediate transition to civil life. They are often called upon in time of peace as well as in time of war to engage in hazardous ventures in furtherance of their duties. If they were continually confronted with the problem of what would happen to them and their families in case they should become incapacitated physically to serve in the Regular Army their efficiency would be dealt a severe blow. Many of the best minds would leave the Army and enter business where they would have better opportunity to save up money for the rainy day. It is necessary that all anxiety in regard to such matters be removed from the minds of the officers of the Regular Army so that they may be free to devote their entire time and thoughts to the efficiency of that Army. This is a policy that must be kept in force at all times.

No such reason whatever applies in the case of the temporary officers of the World War. They were not military specialists. They came from the ranks of the general citizenry of the Nation, from the walks of the everyday business life of the Nation, just the same as the men who served as privates and noncommissioned officers. The one gave up no more than the other. The one is entitled to no preference over the other. These men all came from civil life to serve only for the period of the war, and Congress has provided for their return to civil life, and for the furnishing of training or vocational rehabilitation wherever necessary in order that they might all be returned to productive civil life, with the payment of compensation based on the degree of disability in addition. Such treatment is fair and reasonable.

What will happen if this Bursum bill is passed and becomes law? It is but an entering wedge. It will only be a short time until the temporary officers who have disabilities of less than 30 per cent will be agitating also to be retired on the same basis as the others. Their first attempt was to have retirement granted for a 20 per cent disability. The agitation will be started for separate and better hospital facilities for these temporary officers than are provided for the other ex-service men. Rumblings to that effect are already heard. What next we do not know. Once preference has been granted there is no telling where it will end.

Do the Members of Congress suppose the intelligent and well-educated men who served in the ranks, and who came from just as good homes and positions as these officers, would long tolerate such discrimination? The man who imagines they would has a very poor understanding of them.

Mr. President, at the last session of Congress the bill now before us was considered by the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. A minority report was submitted which presents in a striking way some of the arguments against the bill before us. My understanding is that those signing this report served in the World War and were emergency officers. I ask that it may be inserted at this point in my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The minority views are as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

This is known as the World War emergency officers' retirement bill. If it should become a law it would most unjustly discriminate against all disabled enlisted men and a large part of the disabled emergency officers in favor of a certain class comprising a limited number of disabled emergency officers. It would reward men not according to their disability but according to their rank, thereby violating the very fundamental principles of our American institutions.

For instance, an officer who incurred physical disability in line of duty and has been "or may hereafter be" rated at not less than 30 per cent permanent disability shall be placed upon the retired list at 75 per cent of the salary to which he was entitled at the time of his discharge. What does this mean? It means that an emergency officer with a 30 per cent disability which originated in line of duty shall receive pay for life as follows:

	Per month
Brigadier general	$375.00
Colonel	250.00
Lieutenant colonel	218.75
Major	187.50
Captain	150.00
First lieutenant	125.00
Second lieutenant	93.75

While the enlisted man with a 30 per cent disability will receive $30 a month.

Yet they tell us that the ex-service men are in favor of this measure. That is not true. If every ex-service man in the United States understood what this bill means, we doubt if it would receive the indorsement of 1 service man out of 10.

It even discriminates against an overwhelming majority of the disabled emergency officers themselves. Those who are rated at less than 30 per cent permanent disabled are excluded from a participation in the financial benefits of this measure. They are to receive the same pay as enlisted men with similar disabilities. If a colonel and his enlisted brother were both 30 per cent permanent disabled, the colonel would receive $250 a month while the enlisted man would receive only $30 a month. But if they were both 29 per cent permanent disabled they would both receive the same compensation, $29 a month.

Not only that, but it discriminates against the sacred dead, who "gave the last full measure of devotion" upon the field of battle or have died since the war closed. Their loved ones who were dependent upon them for support would not receive one dollar's worth of benefit from this unjust legislation. The widows and children of officers who gave their lives in the conflict, or who have died since the war closed, would draw compensation on the basis of allowances for the dependents of enlisted men.

The disabled emergency officers are being taken care of now along with the enlisted men. They served together, they fought together, they were frequently members of the same families, and where they suffered the same disabilities they should receive the same treatment.

But the advocates of this bill argue that these disabled emergency officers are discriminated against in the retirement of officers of the Regular Army, and ask Congress to pass this measure to favor 1,848 of these emergency officers and to discriminate against 41,496 enlisted men who are disabled to the same degree and 6,618 disabled emergency officers and 171,580 disabled enlisted men whose disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent, in order to correct what they contend is a discrimination in favor of the officers of the Regular Army.

We are not responsible for the present law providing for the retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment. But if we were, and were willing to concede that there is an injustice in the present law, we would not be justified in trying to offset it by passing additional unjust legislation.

We must remember that officers of the Regular Establishment go into the Army for life. They make it their life's work; and in order to secure the class of men necessary to maintain the proper officer personnel in times of peace we must make some provision for taking care of them in case they become disabled.

As was said by a former Secretary of War:

"The privileges of the retired list of the Regular Army constitute a consideration granted by the Government for the consecration of lives to its military service and the volunteering for life for such service in any exigencies that may arise, whether in peace or war. The military relation requires the officer to give up ambitions which are the rightful portion of every man in the great world outside, and for a measure of compensation which does not exceed what is barely sufficient to maintain himself and family in the status which the military service demands; and the law has said that when he serves a prescribed period of time, or has reached a certain age, or is disabled by injury or disease incident to the service, he must withdraw from active service and give way to a younger man better fitted for the rigors of military life. As the officer has not been trained for a business career or for any career in civil life he finds himself at the end of his service, certainly in the vast majority of cases, not only without a profession, but without a competency."

He also calls attention to the fact that—

"Congress has thus far restricted the privilege of retirement to members of the permanent Military Establishment; that is, to those only who have consecrated their lives to the military service. This is true not alone of the officers but of the enlisted man, who may retire only when he has served a sufficient time to indicate that he has adopted the military service as a life career. To those who have thus pledged their services for life to the Nation, in peace or in war, Congress, as a matter of keeping faith with them, has provided by law that they shall be secure in their calling throughout their lives, and when they have performed what is deemed a life service, shall be relieved of some of the active duties of service and be permitted a living pay for the remainder of their lives. This basic principle of our retirement laws is recognized in an opinion rendered June 10, 1898, by Solicitor General Richards and had the approval of Attorney General Griggs. In discussing the applicability of laws relating to the Regular Army to the then existing volunteer forces, the Solicitor General said:

"'Chapter 2 of Title XIV, providing for the retirement of Army officers, clearly has no application to the Volunteer Army, organized for simply temporary service. This chapter creates two lists of Regular Army officers—the active and the retired list—a distinction which does not obtain in the Volunteer Army. When, therefore, section 1222 places a restriction on every "Army officer on the active list," it plainly refers to Regular Army officers. An Army officer of the active list is one not only active but permanently engaged in the military service of the Government. Having chosen the Army for his career, and being actively engaged therein, the statute properly prohibits him from accepting or exercising the functions of a civil office.

"'While an officer of the Volunteer Army may be said to be actively engaged in the military service, he is not permanently so engaged. He is called out to meet an emergency, and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer, he has not selected the military service for a profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects when the war is over to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need nor demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence, and on his return resume his former work.'"

This is not a new proposition. The Adjutant General stated in a letter to a Member of Congress on February 25, 1926, that—

"Many bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress at different times authorizing the appointment of the retired list of the Army of those officers who served in the Volunteer Army in the Civil War, but none of them has ever been enacted into law."

Congress refused for 50 years and more to pass a law that would thus discriminate between the officers and enlisted men of the Civil War. On May 9, 1917, Hon. Newton D. Baker, then Secretary of War, in a letter to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee with reference to such a measure, made the following prophetic statement:

"Furthermore, if the bill under consideration were to be enacted into law for the benefit of men who served as volunteer officers of the Civil War, it is reasonably certain that it would be followed by other measures for the benefit of volunteer officers of the war with Spain, of officers belonging to the National Guard who have rendered or are now rendering active Federal service, and of officers of the present war not belonging to the permanent Military Establishment. It would seem that the precedent established by the enactment of such legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of one war should, in common fairness, be followed in time by similar legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of all wars. It can be readily seen that the expense involved in any such legislation would be enormous."

The additional expense of this bill for the first year would be $1,190,052. As time goes on the expense will grow. Men will be asking to have their cases reopened and their disabilities readjudged. Those whose disabilities shall have increased to 30 per cent will be entitled to be placed on the pension roll along with the others. And we had just as well admit that this is a permanent pension that we are being asked to allow to these disabled emergency officers. The chances are that we will soon be asked to reduce the degree of disability to 20 per cent, then to 10 per cent, and finally to wipe it out altogether, and to ultimately place the ex-officers on a pension status as officers instead of leaving them to be treated in the same manner as enlisted men. The enlisted men outnumber the officers overwhelmingly, and already some of them are asking that they be given the benefits of this retirement act in case it passes, and that they be retired as second lieutenants. Suppose pressure should be brought to bear upon Congress later to wipe out some of the discriminations of this measure by giving the enlisted men the retirement or pension status of second lieutenant. Ultimately the percentage requirement as to their disabilities would disappear. Who can tell what the ultimate expense to this Government such a pension policy would bring?

This bill is just the opening wedge. It is lifting the latch to the floodgates of expenditure, the consequences of which no one can foretell.

We regret very much that we are unable to agree with the majority of the committee that reported this bill out. But in justice to the enlisted men, who are just as patriotic and just as deserving as the officers; in justice to the many thousands of disabled emergency officers, whose disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent; in justice to the widows and orphans of those who made the supreme sacrifice; in justice to the taxpayers of the United States on whose shoulders the burden of these expenditures would rest, we respectfully dissent from the views of the majority, and submit that this bill ought not to become a law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD, without reading, a letter appearing in the Evening Star of March 12, 1928.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

WORLD WAR ENLISTED MEN ENTITLED TO CONSIDERATION

To the EDITOR OF THE STAR:

A bill now pending in Congress to give emergency World War officers the same monetary retirement pay now paid Regular Army officers isn't what it appears to be on its face. It discriminates against that personnel that won the war—the enlisted man. During the war the emergency officer got the pay of the officer in the Regular Army—the enlisted man got $30. For every officer that manned the trenches, 100 enlisted men did likewise. Heroism and service were no more the part of the officer than of the soldier. Both received the same fire, the same wounds, and the same percentage of disability—except that the ratio of wounded enlisted men was a thousandfold greater than of officers. Under existing law Congress has been equitable and just in the same proportions to both. This proposed law will wipe out that equity and equality by materially increasing the disability pension of the emergency officer over that paid the enlisted man. Now, I ask you, why should that be? If the officer is to get it, why not the boys that need it more, the enlisted men? Their induction into the service was the same, their service to the country identical—their disabilities no different.

Comparing Regular Army officers with emergency officers, as is being done, is camouflage, and aside from the real principle involved in the proposed passage of this bill. Let us have equality before the court in adjudging benefits to the deserving.

CHARLES B. COSTELLO.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator if he believes in our system of retirement for injuries incurred during service in the Regular Army. I do not know whether the Senator believes in that system or not. Does the Senator believe in that system of retirement?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have referred to the statements made by various Secretaries of War and others in which they point out with great clearness the reason for extending retirement benefits to officers of the regular Military Establishments of the United States. I accept those views and believe the reasons assigned for retirement privileges for the regular officers are sound. Officers of the Regular Army, as stated, give their lives to military service. They cut themselves off from other avenues of employment and activity. The compensation paid them for their military service is scarcely sufficient for their subsistence, and to meet imperative demands made in their military activities. They are promised when entering the service as boys, that after many years of service they will be given retirement privileges. As has been stated these privileges are in the nature of deferred payments for services rendered. It is quite certain that many young men would not enter the Army giving their lives to military service if they were not promised that when they become old or are disabled as a result of their service they would be granted retirement privileges. These deferred payments in the shape of retirement privileges are essential to maintain the necessary strength of the Army and of the Navy. This must not be forgotten that even after retirement those men upon the retired list are subject to military service and are frequently called back into active duty.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON], who has seen military service, declares that as a result of his experience there must be retirement privileges given to the officers of the Army and the Navy. He states, in substance, that by entering the military branch of the Government they close the door of opportunity which is open to all young men of our country and they enter upon a path of duty and service which denies to them the advantages which come to others who enter the various fields of private endeavor which are open to the young men of America. These young men who enter the military service make a sacrifice and they are induced in part at least to make this sacrifice by the promise made in the law that they will receive in the nature of deferred payments the retirement privileges provided in the statute. There is, as has been pointed out so clearly, a marked difference between the regular officers of the Army and Navy and those who serve as officers in a temporary way.

The present occupant of the chair [Mr. NEELY] served in the Spanish-American War. He was not a West Point graduate. He had not dedicated his life to military service, but patriotically entered the Army to serve for a limited period. Upon the termination of that war he returned to private life, and has earned high honors in the legal profession, and now serves with ability his State in this legislative branch of the Government. To insist that those who served as did the distinguished Senator and others, who temporarily came into the Army during the World War, should be placed in the same category as the Regular Army and Navy officers is to deny, as I view the case, facts which clearly differentiate the two classes of officers, and to inaugurate a policy which does not rest upon just or substantial grounds.

Moreover, as was indicated by the Senator from Iowa, if the emergency officers are to be given greater compensation than they now receive, and also retirement privileges, then their brothers in arms drawn from the same democratic ranks should receive the same privileges and benefits. The letters which I have received from ex-service men who did not receive commissions clearly indicate that they feel that it would be discrimination to grant retirement privileges to their brothers and associates who happened to receive commissions and then deny the same privileges to them. One of the ex-service men wrote me that his brother happened to receive a commission because he was a bookkeeper. He was commissioned a captain and served as an accountant for a number of months. He was ill from the influenza and suffered some disabilities. The writer volunteered and served in France where he received injuries of a permanent character, injuries far more serious than the disabilities suffered by his brother who was in the accounting service of the Army. Under this bill the bookkeeper would receive several hundred dollars a month retirement privileges; and the brother who fought as a private and was wounded would receive $60 per month. He contended that this was discrimination that could not be justified.

I have here a list of some of the persons employed in the Veterans' Bureau who are receiving disability compensation and at the same time are getting rather large salaries from the Government. For like disabilities their brothers in arms who happened to be privates would be discriminated against. If the bill before us becomes a law these individuals would continue to receive their salaries and at the same time retirement privileges greatly in excess of the amounts now being received by them by way of compensation, and, of course, in excess of payments made to ex-service men who were not commissioned and whose disabilities are of like character. I ask that this list be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. It will be observed from the foregoing list that there are emergency officers who are receiving compensation for disabilities of as much as $150 per month and at the same time some of them are receiving $6,200 a year salary from the Veterans' Bureau. If this bill becomes law their compensation of course will be greatly increased. For instance, Captain Duncan will receive $150 per month as retirement pay and he is also receiving $5,007 salary. Captain Hindman will receive $150 per month as retirement pay. He is receiving $4,000 per annum as salary. Captain Johnson's salary is $4,400, and under the bill he will receive $1,800 additional as compensation. Major Kendell is receiving $5,200 salary and yet his disabilities will give him under the pending bill $187.50 per month additional. Major Leewy is receiving $5,800 salary and is also receiving compensation in the amount of $1,200 a year which if the present bill passes will be increased to $2,487.50.

Colonel Smith is receiving $6,000 salary and if the present bill becomes a law he will have added to that amount $2,625. Captain Whitledge is receiving a salary of $6,278 and compensation for disabilities of $63 per month. If the pending bill becomes law he will receive as retirement pay $1,800 which, of course, will be in addition to his salary. It will be observed that the disabilities suffered by the persons whose names appear in the above list do not prevent them from receiving large salaries. Undoubtedly, there are thousands of emergency officers receiving compensation, who, if this bill becomes law, will receive larger amounts under the retirement provisions, and who are also receiving important salaries and will continue in the future to receive the same.

My information is that there are a considerable number of emergency officers who are rated as having disabilities who fill important positions in various departments of the Government with salaries larger than they were receiving before entering the war, and I am also told that many emergency officers, both of the Army and the Navy, are filling important positions in business enterprises who are receiving compensation for disabilities attributable to their military service. They will be beneficiaries under this act and have all of the retirement privileges provided, notwithstanding the salaries and emoluments received by them from the work which they are performing in the various activities of life.

I have heretofore stated that if emergency and volunteer officers are to be given retirement privileges it will be a departure from a long-established policy which was adopted after mature consideration by the great men of our country, including those who held important military positions in the various wars through which our country has passed. The pension system was adopted and has been followed in dealing with those who performed military service in behalf of their country.

I now call attention to the provisions of the law under which pensions are being paid to veterans of the Civil War, and I shall later show that Congress has made liberal provisions for veterans of the World War who suffered disabilities.

For disabilities incurred in the service, for disabilities incurred out of the service, for service alone, the existing pension laws apply with equality to all persons who have had honorable war service. Out of the plentitude of experience which has run through the whole course of the Government since the act of August 26, 1776, the policy of the Government has finally become settled, in laws which provide pensions for disability incurred in the service to be paid from the date of disability; to pensions for disability without regard to service origin, which pensions are to be paid commencing with a period after the close of hostilities and to be paid for service alone without regard to disability to such veterans as shall attain the age of 62 years. The war against Germany was comparable only to the Civil War. Both wars were fought by great civilian armies in which both the officers and men came from civil life and upon the conclusion of hostilities returned to civil life. Neither of these wars was fought or won by the regular or professional military organization.

The movement to give officers taken from civil life and who were discharged at the conclusion of the war the status of retired officers of the Regular Establishment, whose retirement has nothing to do with war service and whose widows are not pensionable, except the widows of officers who have had war service, is contrary to the settled pension policy of the Government and presents a disturbing factor in the permanence and consistency of our pension policy. The program proposed was rejected many years ago because it was regarded as inconsistent with the ideals and principles of a great democratic country in which all citizens are required to respond as of duty in time of war and where the Government recognizes an obligation to care for the wounded and disabled without regard to station or rank and likewise to care for the aged veterans without distinction and upon a basis of entire equality.

It has been more than 60 years since the close of the Civil War. There were on July 1, 1927, 90,000 veterans of the Civil War on the pension rolls. There were 212,642 widows of Civil War veterans and 49 Civil War nurses on the pension roll. These veterans are all of more than 80 years of age. They are regarded as being totally disabled as far as the capacity to perform remunerative labor is concerned. Of these veterans 37,700 were receiving pensions of $65 per month; 44,084 were receiving pensions of $72 per month; and 7,477 were receiving pensions of $90 per month.

The widows who were the wives of veterans during their Civil War service received pensions of $50 per month and the other widows pensionable under the law received pensions of $30 per month. The basis for these pensions is 90 days of honorable service in the Civil War. No distinction is made between officers and men.

It is 30 years since the Spanish-American War. There were on July 1, 1927, 138,812 veterans of the Spanish-American War on the pension rolls drawing disability pensions. There were 23,547 widows of the Spanish-American War veterans and 279 nurses on the pension roll. Of these veterans of the Spanish-American War, 44,831 were receiving pensions at $20 per month; 34,526 were receiving pensions at $25 per month; 27,663 were receiving pensions of $30 per month; 16,228 were receiving pensions of $40 per month; 12,971 were receiving pensions of $50 per month; and 846 were receiving pensions of $72 per month. These were disability pensions. The $50 rate is awarded for total disability and the $72 rate is awarded for total disability accompanied by such condition of helplessness as requires the aid and attendance of another person. The other rates of $20, $25, $30, and $40 are awarded for partial disability and in such degree as the rate bears to $50, the rate for total disability. Widows of Spanish-American War veterans are pensioned at $30 a month with $6 additional for each child under 16 years of age.

I now direct attention to what is being done for those who suffered disabilities in the World War. I submit that Congress has made liberal provision for compensation in behalf of those who served in the World War and received injuries and suffered disabilities. Congress made no distinction between officers and enlisted men. It treated all as valiant soldiers in a great democratic army. At the present time there are more than 10,000 emergency officers receiving disability compensation.

On September 30, 1927, 8,096 officers had been given a disability rating of less than 30 per cent and were drawing compensation at the average rate of $31 per month; 1,865 of these officers who had been rated for partial disability equal to or in excess of 30 per cent are drawing compensation at the average rate of $50 per month; 1,358 of these officers who have been rated for total disability equal to or in excess of 30 per cent, are drawing compensation at the average rate of $102 per month. The rate for total disability provided for veterans of the Spanish-American War is $50 per month. The rate provided for veterans of the Civil War in their advanced age and enfeebled condition is $65 per month, with a special rate of $72 for Civil War veterans who require the care and attention of another person, and a special rate of $90 per month for Civil War veterans who are entirely helpless. As against these total disability rates for the veterans of the Spanish-American War and the Civil War, the officers of the World War who have a rating of total disability are drawing average compensation of $102 per month, and officers of the World War who have been rated for partial disability equal to or exceeding 30 per cent are drawing compensation at the average rate of $50 per month, which is equal to the rate provided for total disability for the veterans of the Spanish-American War.

Congress, accordingly, has awarded more liberal disability compensation to officers of the World War than has been provided for officers of the Spanish-American War or the Civil War. In fact, the total disability rate for the officer of the World War is more than double the rate provided for total disability in the case of an officer of the Spanish-American War and is more than 50 per cent in excess of the pensions provided for the disabled, aged, and helpless veterans of the Civil War.

Mr. President, I am not criticizing the apparent discrimination in favor of the officers of the World War who suffered disabilities. I voted for these measures and for the appropriations under which payments are made to those suffering disabilities. I am, however, opposing the policy which overthrows an established one, and discriminates against the officers themselves as well as against the volunteer officers of the Civil and Spanish-American wars and against the ex-service men who fought and served their country but did not obtain commissions.

I have noted above that the average compensation for total disability that is being paid to officers of the World War is $102. The average compensation that is being paid to officers of the Army who have been given a rating of total disability is $127 per month, with $50 per month as the average compensation for partial disability exceeding 30 per cent. For the Navy the average compensation for total disability is $100 a month and for partial disability exceeding 30 per cent $50 per month, and for the Marine Corps the average compensation for total disability is $95 per month and for partial disability exceeding 30 per cent $47 per month.

The pending bill provides that the officers of the Army who served in the World War and who retired to civil life after the armistice, and who have been rated by the Veterans' Bureau for disability in excess of 30 per cent, shall be placed upon a special retired list in the Veterans' Bureau and in lieu of the compensation they are presently receiving, shall be paid three-fourths of the monthly pay of their rank as of the date when discharged from the service after the war.

It has been pointed out by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] that the officers who will receive the benefit of this bill, if it becomes law, will have an advantage over officers of the Regular Army, because the latter would not get the three-fourths retirement pay as of the rank which they held at the period of their discharge, but they would be relegated to a lower rank as the basis for their retirement privileges.

The pending bill provides that the emergency officers who secure a rating for disability are to have their names published annually in the Army register, whereas the other officers of the World War who have not been rated for disability are not to have their names published in the Army register. There may be a reason for such legislation, but I can not understand what it is. Two men are officers—one a captain, the other a major. The captain receives a rating of 30 per cent disability and his name is placed in the Army register. It may be the captain was not upon the battle field at all but was serving in the United States in some clerical position; but the major fought gallantly upon the battle field, and because he did not incur a disability his name is not to be placed in the register. It would seem that the honor of having their names in the Army register is quite as much the right of officers who served with honor during the World War, but who were not disabled in the service, as it is the right of those who were overtaken by disability in the service.

This view has been expressed to me by some officers who have suffered disabilities but who will not claim benefits under this bill. Some of them, though their disabilities are rather serious, are earning a considerable amount monthly and do not feel like submitting claims for disabilities. These officers will not have their names placed upon this roll of honor.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, they may have their names put upon the roll of honor and not draw the pay, unless they want to do so. They do not have to draw the pay. The reason they are put upon the roll of honor is because they have more than 10 per cent disability.

Mr. KING. There are many officers who will not claim disability even for the purpose of having their names upon the roll.

Mr. TYSON. That being the case, that is their own fault. If they do not want to do it, that is up to them. We are not responsible for anybody who is not willing to take advantage of an opportunity which is given him.

Mr. KING. It appears then that an inducement is offered to officers to get their names upon the roll of honor, the inducement being that they submit claims for disability ratings.

Mr. TYSON. Does not the Senator realize that there are a great many men who were disabled in the World War but who are less than 10 per cent disabled? They get no consideration whatever.

Mr. KING. I understand that. That is purely arbitrary, however.

Mr. TYSON. Nevertheless, that is done; it is done by the law; and I take it the Senator helped to pass that law.

Mr. KING. I do not recall the provision of which the Senator is speaking.

Mr. TYSON. The Senator, however, does know that no man who was disabled less than 10 per cent gets any compensation?

Mr. KING. I comprehend that. But this bill as presented contained another discrimination. It includes only the disabled officers of the Army and not those of the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard.

Mr. TYSON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. KING. An amendment covering emergency Navy and Marine Corps officers has been offered, but when the bill was originally projected, and under the Bursum bill when it was offered by the Senator a year ago, and again submitted at the beginning of this session, there was no provision for the Navy and the Marine Corps.

Mr. TYSON. It was understood, however, that an amendment would be offered to cover emergency naval and Marine Corps officers.

Mr. KING. Of course, I can not say as to that; I was not in the confidence of the Senator, but I know that such an amendment has now been offered. However, may I say to the Senator that there is no provision in the bill for reserve officers of the National Guard and militia? They may claim the same privileges as are granted by this bill; they constituted a part of our military forces. Why should not officers of the National Guard, with the same disabilities, be accorded the same treatment as is given to emergency officers under this bill?

Mr. TYSON. I agree with the Senator; and I suggest that he introduce a bill at the proper time to have that injustice corrected.

Mr. KING. If I introduce a bill, it will be a bill that will provide that enlisted men who fought in the ranks and served in the trenches shall receive the same compensation for similar injuries as is paid to men who happened temporarily to have commissions.

The beneficiaries of the bill, as of date September 30, 1927, include 3,030 emergency Army officers of the World War, who are divided into two distinct classes. In one class there are 1,233 officers who are on the books of the Veterans' Bureau as being totally disabled who are drawing average compensation in the sum of $102 per month and in the other class are 797 officers who are on the books of the Veterans' Bureau as having partial disabilities in excess of 30 per cent who are drawing average compensation in the sum of $50 per month. The present average compensation of the officers in the second class is about two-fifths or 40 per cent of the average compensation of the officers in the first class. This bill puts both groups of officers in the same classification as far as future compensation is concerned and makes provision that they shall be paid three-fourths of the regular pay of their rank for life. In September, 1927, there were 176 officers of the Navy, including the Coast Guard, and 17 officers of the Marine Corps who will come within the operation of the act if the bill be so amended as to include disabled officers of the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard.

I have referred to the fact that a number of officers who will obtain retirement privileges if this bill becomes a law will be greatly in excess of the number claimed by the proponents of this bill. When the bill was first considered it was insisted that not more than 1,000 persons would obtain retirement privileges. It is now conceded that there are several thousand who at the present time come within the terms of the bill. There have been claims for compensation filed by emergency Army officers up to December 31 of last year of the number of 41,532. The annual report of the Secretary of the Navy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, states that—

> There were half a million enlisted men and more than 32,500 officers in the Navy and Naval Reserve Force when hostilities ended in November, 1918.

The report of the major general commanding the United States Marine Corps for the year ending June 1, 1918, states that there were 2,418 officers in the Marine Corps. The total number of officers in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, accordingly, were therefore 234,918. I have stated that of this number 188,559 were emergency Army officers, and that 41,532 of this number have claimed compensation.

There are now 10,142 of this number receiving compensation and a large number of applications are pending before the Veterans' Bureau. The list is daily growing so that it is impossible to determine the number that will finally be added to the list. Of this number 3,390 are rated less than 30 per cent, but as being permanently disabled. The number rated at less than 30 per cent who have temporary disabilities is given as 1,015. However, reratings are constantly taking place and officers are being transferred from lower to higher grades—that is, from ratings less than 30 per cent to ratings in excess of 30 per cent. Moreover, some who are rated as temporarily disabled may be transferred to-morrow to the permanently disabled list. The Veterans' Bureau notified me at noon to-day that there are 10,142 emergency officers in the Army who are on the active list. To-morrow there may be more, as the ratings are being constantly changed. Some who are less than 30 per cent may, to-morrow or the succeeding day, be placed in the categories of disabilities in excess of 30 per cent. Nor is it possible to determine how many emergency officers will apply for compensation and for retirement within a year after the passage of this bill, if it should pass. It is impossible to determine how many of the 188,559 officers will ultimately be placed upon the retired list under the provisions of this bill and the amendment withdrawing the time limitation.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, what does the Senator mean by the "amendment withdrawing the time limitation"?

Mr. KING. It is an amendment which extends the time to file applications and, of course, with pressure which will be brought, Congress will remove the time limitation as the years go by and ultimately every officer proving the required disability will be placed upon the retired list. The Senator knows that although we fix 30 per cent as the datum line for the purpose of obtaining retirement privileges, that line will be removed and sooner or later those claiming disabilities of 10 per cent or more will be given the retirement privileges.

When legislation of this character first came before Congress after the World War, the limit was fixed at 10 per cent. Propaganda in favor of that limitation was as great as the pressure exercised in behalf of this bill which fixes disability at 30 per cent as the standard for retirement privileges. As I have shown, 42,000 of the emergency officers in the Army were physicians and 2,000 chaplains. Some of the physicians suffered disabilities and, of course, should be given the same benefits granted to other emergency officers of the same grade. As a matter of fact, many of the emergency officers were not in France, and a great majority were never upon the battle fields. Many thousand officers served in clerical capacities and in administrative duties in the United States. Many were engaged in business activities for the Government and incurred no greater risks or hazards than did private citizens of the United States. It has been suggested upon various occasions that if retirement privileges are to be granted they should be extended only to those who did the fighting and not to those who incurred no more risks or hazards than those in civil life. It has also been suggested that retirement privileges should not be granted to emergency officers whose earnings are as great as or greater than were received by them prior to the war. Another suggestion has been made that if the disability does not materially interfere with the earning capacity of an officer he should be denied the retirement privileges.

Amendments of this character, no matter their merit, will receive but scant support in this body. The propaganda in favor of the bill as it is before us has been so great and the pressure so powerful that there is no chance of writing into the bill any important amendment or any provision that might interfere with its passage regardless of its virtues.

Mr. President, there are now many active claims for compensation of emergency officers who served in the Navy and in the Marine Corps. The number, therefore, of active claims which I gave a few moments ago does not give the aggregate and should be increased by the list of officers from the Navy and from the Marine Corps. I am calling attention, Mr. President, to these matters for the purpose of demonstrating that some Senators have not understood the full implications of this bill and the thousands of persons who will be beneficiaries thereunder.

Mr. President, this bill will afford no benefits to second lieutenants who have been rated for total disability. Their monthly compensation will be reduced from $99 to $93.75.

The increase accorded first lieutenants and captains who have been rated for total disability and of whom there were from the Army on September 30, 1927, 761, does not warrant the pressure that is being expended to force this bill through Congress.

No one begrudges these officers who have been rated for total disability a just compensation or pension. In September last 1,865 officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, including the Coast Guard, were rated for partial disability only, and who are now drawing compensation at the average rate of $50 per month; they will have their pay increased to $125 per month for first lieutenants and to $150 per month for captains, which for 450 Army captains will mean a trebling of their pay and which for 113 Army majors will mean an increase of their monthly pay to 375 per cent of the compensation awarded them by the Veterans' Bureau, and which for 17 lieutenant colonels of the Army will mean an increase of their monthly pay 437½ per cent of the compensation awarded them by the Veterans' Bureau, and which for 5 colonels will means an increase in their monthly pay to over 500 per cent of the compensation awarded them by the Veterans' Bureau, and which for 1 general of the Army will mean an increase of his monthly pay to 625 per cent of the compensation awarded him by the Veterans' Bureau. As against these unwarranted magnifications of compensation for partial disability we have an actual reduction of the compensation of second lieutenants for total disability, and an increase of less than 25 per cent for totally disabled first lieutenants, and less than 50 per cent for totally disabled captains. If there ever was a case of flagrantly partial legislation the pending bill is an example of it.

The bill is not only unfair to the more than 30,000 veterans of the war who have been rated for permanent total disability and the 100,000 veterans of the war who are rated for permanent partial disability, but is grossly unfair and unequal as between the officers who are the ostensible beneficiaries of the proposed legislation. During the fiscal year 1927 there was an average number of 237,076 veterans who were drawing compensation in one form or the other for whom the average rates was $50.66 per month.

The bill unfairly selects 78 out of each 10,000 veterans who are rated for disability and all of whom are receiving an average of $50 per month and gives them special benefits by which their monthly compensation is raised from 300 to 625 per cent. It means everything to the only partially disabled officers who make up a very clear preponderance of the total number of officers who are the ostensible beneficiaries of the bill. Many who become officers of the Army were not manual laborers and their economic and earning capacity is not seriously affected by such minor physical defects or damages as would accord them a rating of 30 per cent disability made from the standpoint of their capacity to perform crude manual labor. There have been Senators of the United States who for blindness would be rated as 200 per cent disabled by the Veterans' Bureau, yet they have drawn $10,000 a year in salaries from the Government.

A man whose record is for 30 per cent disability is expected to be able to carry on his business and to be engaged in gainful occupations. It is difficult to see how a 30 per cent disability ascribable to physical defects can be regarded as affecting the earning capacity of a man who carries on an intellectual occupation, who employs his own mind in the business, and who directs the work of others who perform manual labor.

A considerable number of the officers who are rated for 30 per cent partial disability reside in the District of Columbia and its environs. Why did not the committee call these men before it, ascertain the nature of the physical defects for which they are drawing $50 or more per month, and ascertain whether or not their earning power has been actually decreased and whether or not in any case they are drawing less than the standard and customary pay for the business or service which they are following?

I am adverse to that. In the great majority of cases they are drawing large salaries and that the increase carried by this bill of from 300 to 625 per cent per month is not warranted out of any consideration of poverty or financial distress. It is believed that thousands of disabled veterans who were not in the class of these officers, have much higher claims to increased compensation on the ground of poverty or of lack of economic independence.

Mr. President, from the letters which I have received I infer that there is a feeling in some parts of the country that emergency officers who are suffering from disabilities are receiving no compensation whatever from the Government. Of course the fact is quite the reverse. They are receiving compensation to the same extent as are all ex-service men who have been wounded or have suffered disabilities by reason of their military service. I have shown that many emergency officers in addition to compensation of from $100 to $150 per month, are employed by the Government, and some are receiving salaries of from $5,000 to $6,200 per annum. It is often stated that the Government has been illiberal in appropriating for the ex-service men. I desire to present a few figures indicating what the facts are in respect to this matter. In the fiscal year 1927 there were 25,567 veterans in Government hospitals under the charge of the Veterans' Bureau. During the same year the Government paid out $36,154,237 for medical and hospital services and facilities, which is an average of over $1,400 per capita for the veterans who had the benefit of this hospital and medical service. Men who were in the hospitals received total disability pay during the time of their hospitalization.

These figures show the solicitude of the Government for disabled veterans. I am glad to learn of the efforts of the Government to care for disabled veterans and for veterans whether reserve officers or privates and to grant to them just, fair, and generous treatment.

The figures just referred to demonstrate that the Government in 1927 paid out considerably more than $2,000 per capita for the veterans who were in the hospitals, among whom were some of the officers who are drawing disability compensation from the Veterans' Bureau under the present law. The expenditures for salaries and expenses of the Veterans' Bureau for the fiscal year 1927 amounted to $36,354,328.90, a sum which is equal to the amount laid out for hospital and medical services and facilities. This large overhead cost is to be referred in large measure to the administration of the hospital service and facilities.

The average number of active compensation awards from the Veterans' Bureau in the fiscal year 1927 was 237,076. This means that the Veterans' Bureau was distributing monthly compensation to 237,076 veterans rated for disability. At the close of the fiscal year 1927 the Pension Bureau was distributing pensions to 489,942 pensioners, at an administrative overhead cost of $1,327,252. To bring this matter into clear relief, the Pension Bureau in the fiscal year 1927 distributed $230,152,712.17 to 489,942 pensioners, at an overhead cost of $1,327,252.47, whereas the Veterans' Bureau in the fiscal year 1927 distributed $173,476,965.39 compensation to 237,076 veterans of the World War, at an overhead cost of $36,354,328.

The total expenditures of the Veterans' Bureau in the fiscal year 1927 were $405,348,447.70. The question has been suggested as to whether this large sum would not be of more benefit to the veterans if distributed to the beneficiaries direct, as are pensions, instead of being charged with overhead costs and special services to the extent of many millions annually.

In further support of the statement that Congress has been liberal in appropriating for veterans of the World War I call attention to the fact that in 1917 the appropriations were $50,250,000; in 1918, $181,297,800; in 1919, $141,918,833; in 1920, $252,291,769; in 1921, $316,359,672; in 1922, $406,770,342; in 1923, $425,462,323; in 1924, $436,514,053; in 1925, $481,957,898; in 1926, $521,950,000; and in 1927, $462,965,000.

A letter from Director Hines, dated February 28, 1928, states that the disbursements made by the Government for vocational training totaled $644,937,396.28; for term insurance, $960,942,334.57; for United States Government life insurance, $61,660,216.76; for compensation, $1,173,515,358.71; for allotments, $300,852,071.66; for allowances, $282,087,704.94; for marine and seamen's insurance, $35,074,818.69; for medical and hospital services, $309,459,156.37; for hospital facilities and services, $29,348,345.57; for soldiers' and sailors' civil relief claims, $19,383.65; administrative, $281,678,615.53; adjusted service certificate fund, $63,454,105.15; adjusted service and dependent pay, $26,403,402.72; miscellaneous, $47,164.38; or a total of $4,169,480,074.98.

In the light of these figures, there is no warrant for the statement so often heard that Congress had dealt with the ex-service men in a niggardly way. Let me present a few figures by way of comparison between the Civil War and the World War and the treatment accorded to veterans of each contest. The Civil War lasted four years. The World War lasted 1 year 7 months and 5 days. The number of men in the Union Armies was 2,400,000 and in the World War more than four and a half million. In the World War the battle casualties were 50,000 killed and 23,500 wounded.

Deaths from disease were 56,991. Out of every hundred soldiers and sailors 2 were killed or died of disease. In the Civil War out of every hundred soldiers and sailors 10 were killed or died of disease. The number of casualties in the Civil War were 110,070 killed and died of wounds, 224,586 died of disease, and deaths from other causes totaled 24,872. The total number of deaths were 359,528 and the number of wounded who survived August 1, 1866 were 208,040.

In the first 11 years following the close of the Civil War—that is, from 1866 to 1876, inclusive—the disbursements for pensions amounted to $298,267,071.17. For the 11 years from 1917 to 1927, inclusive, the appropriations for the benefit of veterans of the World War were $3,677,737,691.

If we distribute the pension appropriations of 1876 among the 232,137 beneficiaries we produce a distribution of $124.70 per capita. A distribution of the Veterans' Bureau appropriations for 1927 among the 232,077 beneficiaries produces a distribution of $1,994.77 per capita. In other words the per capita distribution of 1927 is seventeen times the per capita distribution for 1876. There are doubtless elements in this comparison which upon critical analysis might be denominated invidious, but after making all allowances possible the figures submitted establish the fact that the Government has dealt generously with the veterans of the World War. I am glad such is the case. It would be a matter of sincere regret to me if our Government should fail to discharge its duty toward those who constituted our military forces upon land and upon sea in the World War, the greatest war that has befallen humanity.

As stated, Mr. President, I have submitted these figures because of criticisms indulged in so often throughout the country that Congress has neglected to meet the legitimate requirements of the ex-service men.

Returning to the bill before us it will not be inappropriate to repeat that this measure is not for the benefit of the veterans who on September 30, 1927, were rated for total disability by the Veterans' Bureau and who are in a great majority of the cases drawing approximately as much, and in a great many cases larger, compensation from the Government than will be afforded by this bill. It is apparent that this measure is of special advantage to the approximately 2,000 veterans who on that date were rated for partial disability only, and who are drawing an average of $50 per month, and are in less need of increased compensation than thousands of veterans now receiving disability compensation under existing law, but who are in no wise beneficiaries of this bill. The director of the bureau stated before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate on March 5, 1926, that—

> It is the business of the Veterans' Bureau, as you gentlemen know, to deal with all ex-service men regardless of rank held in the service. In other words, we deal with them based on their disabilities and their industrial handicaps now, and we make no distinction in their care or treatment in any way.

But this bill creates a separate class of beneficiaries who are entitled to special consideration from the fact or the accident of the military rank which they may have held during their temporary period of military service. The bill gives special status to those officers of the Army who were appointed to serve during the emergency created by the World War. It was understood that their services would be temporary or for the duration of the war, and these men had a right to anticipate benefits in the way of disability pensions or compensation of the same general character which were given to disabled veterans of the Civil War and of the war with Spain. Those benefits have been accorded them. Every one of the beneficaries of the special legislation incorporated in the pending bill are the present beneficiaries of the liberal compensation for disability provided by the World War veterans' act of 1924.

The bill before us provides that these officers in lieu of the compensation provided in the World War veterans' act shall be put on a special retired list as though they were permanent officers of the Army and draw pay at 75 per cent of the pay provided for active service to officers of the same rank.

These temporary officers are to be made regular officers for the purpose of drawing permanent pay. We may well hesitate before committing the Government to this policy. We should consider well the ultimate end to which it obviously will lead us. The pending bill applies to those officers who have suffered disability which has been given a rating of 30 per cent by the Veterans' Bureau or who may within one year be given a rating of 30 per cent by the Veterans' Bureau. This means that the door is wide open for applications to increase disability now rated at less than 30 per cent to 30 per cent or more in order to draw permanent pay equivalent to 75 per cent of the pay of the rank for active service.

This means that the compensation paid lieutenants who have disability ratings will be practically double the compensation paid the ordinary veteran for the same disability. About two-thirds of the disabled officers are lieutenants. About one-quarter of them are captains. Less than 10 per cent of the disabled officers have rank above that of a captain. There are very few of the disabled officers of the World War who had rank during the service indicating real responsibility for the command of units in general military operations. There are, in fact, only 12 temporary colonels and 21 temporary lieutenant colonels who had disability presently rated at 30 per cent. No officers above the rank of colonel have been rated for disability at 30 per cent. There may be some distinction in education between the ordinary veteran and the lieutenant, but there is little distinction in age or experience. There is no distinction in patriotism. The lieutenants served with their men, took the same hazards, and suffered the same disabilities, or suffered disabilities under identical circumstances. To distinguish between them the compensation awarded for identical disabilities suffered in identical services and under the same circumstances and operating for a common objective can not be supported on any consideration of sound policy. It brings in class distinction where none should exist. These men are all veterans. They should be received and treated as such. They should be regarded as equals in the law as they are regarded as equals by the people.

This distinction is all the less unwarranted, because the pending bill does not propose to retire these officers as a part of the personnel of the permanent establishment in which the officers are commissioned for life and are retired for age. The pending bill proposes to create a distinct and separate category in the Veterans' Bureau for these officers who have been out of the service for 10 years and have the Veterans' Bureau give them compensation in the form of retirement pay as distinguished from compensation in the ordinary form. What the bill calls an "emergency officers' retired list" is to be a mere form in the records of the Veterans' Bureau. It will have nothing to do with the Army Establishment as such or with the retired list of the Regular Establishment. These officers will be under none of the duties to which an officer of the Regular Establishment must be subjected or the commands to which he must respond. The retired list of the Army is a regulation which applies in peace as well as war. Retirements are for such disability or age as disqualifies the permanent Army officer from active service. It is not a casualty list. It is a list of those permanent officers who for one reason or another become incapacitated for service, and inasmuch as their appointments are for life it would be improper for the Government to summarily discharge them, and hence the law provides that they shall be continued on part pay for the duration of their lives.

In enacting the so-called bonus legislation Congress allowed all the veterans, including captains, first lieutenants, and lieutenants, an additional $1.25 per day for the time served in France and $1 a day for time served in the United States, and taking this extra or additional compensation for days served as and for a premium, each of the veterans of the war, including captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants, was given a paid-up policy of insurance, adjusted to their separate premiums and ages in each individual case. In this bonus legislation and insurance legislation Congress dealt with captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants upon an entire equality with the other 4,500,000 veterans of the war.

No distinctions were made. Congress gave these captains and lieutenants the same advantage of the adjusted compensation and insurance which it gave to the war veterans generally. And now we are asked to make of them a separate class. It can not be contended that this legislation will benefit in any way, present or prospectively, the Regular Military Establishment. It is not designed for the promotion of the military interest of the United States. There are no sound reasons to support the pending bill. There are the soundest reasons why it should be rejected. It is impolitic in its conception, and it will be impolitic in its result if it becomes the law of the land. It is contrary to the established military policy of Congress in dealing with this subject of compensation and pensions. The wise and reasonable thing to do is for Congress to be consistent and to see to it that the laws affecting this subject are consistent within themselves, and in relation to each other. We can not have equality upon any other principle, and legislation which is not equal in its operation on persons who are entitled to equal consideration of the Government does not comport with the fundamental principles which should govern the relation of Congress to the people under the Constitution of the United States and those republican principles of Government which are embodied in it and which should be the guiding principles of our legislation.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I believe there is no Member of the Senate who is more anxious to come to a vote speedily on the pending bill than I am. For nine years I have been working for this bill and for other legislation fostered by the ex-service men's organizations. I have listened for about six hours to the debate on this subject and I think I can get through with my remarks in six minutes.

With regard to the historic question brought up by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I should like to have printed in the RECORD without reading a statement of the disability pension rates for officers and enlisted men from the Revolutionary War to the present day, which I think will show that this is no new policy which is being adopted, but a policy which has been consistently followed by the Government of the United States since Revolutionary times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

DISABILITY PENSION RATES FOR OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN

(Page numbers given refer to "Laws of the United States governing the granting of Army and Navy pensions," in effect March 5, 1925, published by the Government Printing Office and compiled under the direction of the Commissioner of Pensions and published in accordance with the provisions of section 4748, Revised Statutes.)

REVOLUTIONARY WAR

Page 9. Rate of pensions for known wounds incurred during the Revolutionary War are as follows under the act of April 10, 1806:

Commissioned officers: One-half of the monthly pay legally allowed at the time of incurring said disability, but no pension shall be calculated at a higher rate than one-half pay of a lieutenant colonel.

Enlisted men: Five dollars a month.

CAMPAIGN ON WABASH

Page 10, act of April 10, 1812: The same provisions as the foregoing Revolutionary pensions are made applicable to the campaign on the Wabash.

WAR OF 1812

Page 10. Act of April 24, 1816: The persons on the pension rolls on April 24, 1816, had their pensions increased for all ranks of first lieutenant and under, as follows:

First lieutenant	$17
Second lieutenant	15
Third lieutenant	14
Ensign	13
Noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates	8

This act of April 24, 1816, further provides that all laws and regulations relating to pensions of officers and soldiers of the Regular Army shall relate equally to the officers and soldiers of the militia while in the service of the United States.

BLACK HAWK WAR

Page 10. Act of June 15, 1832: Officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates raised for the protection of the frontier, in case of disability by wounds or otherwise incurred in the service, shall be entitled to like compensation as allowed to officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates in the Military Establishment of the United States.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN FLORIDA

CREEK WAR

MEXICAN WAR

Page 12. Section 4730, Revised Statutes: Officers and enlisted men, whether of the Regular Army or Volunteers, for total disability by reason of injury received or disease contracted while in line of duty, in service in the war with Mexico shall receive half of the pay of their rank at the date on which the wound was received or the disease contracted, not exceeding half of the pay of a lieutenant colonel.

CIVIL WAR

Page 30: The act of July 14, 1862, states that the beneficiaries for disability shall be officers of the Army, including Regulars, Volunteers, and militia, marine and enlisted men, however employed in the military or naval service (in the Civil War).

Page 31, section 4695, gives the rate of pensions for total disability for the persons mentioned in the preceding paragraph:

	Per month
Lieutenant colonel and officers of higher rank	$30
Major	25
Captain	20
First lieutenant	17
Second lieutenant	15
Certain other officers and warrant officers	10
All enlisted men	8

Page 175. Subsequent enactments as given below increased the pay of the disabled enlisted men through the medium of general service pensions, but these enactments did not reduce the pay of the disabled officers, and the rate of pay of the disabled officers was not reached by the enlisted men through the enactment of service pensions until the act of May 11, 1912, which gave a general service pension of $30 a month to all officers and enlisted men of the Civil War who had reached the age of 75 years and served two years or more.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

The officers and enlisted men who incurred disability in the Spanish-American War, whether volunteer or regular, received pensions under the general pension law of July 14, 1862, which set the maximum for an officer at $30 a month and the enlisted personnel at $8 a month for total disability.

The disabled emergency officer of the Spanish-American War continued to receive more than the disabled emergency enlisted men of this war until the act of June 5, 1920, when the enlisted men were granted a service pension with maximum payments of $30 a month, a sum equal to the pay being received by the disabled officers with the rank of lieutenant colonel and above.

Mr. CUTTING. It is very remarkable to me, Mr. President, that the opposition to this bill has come from so many different angles and has been supported by so many different arguments. We have heard the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] argue that, while on the face of the figures furnished by the Veterans' Bureau there are only 3,000 men who will benefit by this proposed act, in the course of the next 2 years or 5 years or 10 years there may be as many as 50,000 men who will receive the benefit of its provisions. On the other hand, we have heard the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] arguing that only a very small proportion of the emergency officers would be benefited by this bill. The Senator from Connecticut went so far as to say that many of the 3,000 now on the list will not be able to accept the benefits of the measure or will not be willing to accept them.

My opinion of that matter, Mr. President, is that the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Connecticut are very much closer to the facts than is my friend from Utah. My experience with the Veterans' Bureau leads me to the conclusion that when this bill becomes a law the Veterans' Bureau will be more inclined to lower the rating of officers who have applied for compensation than they will to raise it. I do not believe there will be any great increase beyond the 3,000 who apparently will be the principal beneficiaries of the bill.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe it makes any difference whether the number of 3,000 is going to be increased or decreased. The point is whether or not the United States owes this debt to the emergency officers who served it in time of war. It is not a question of how many there are or how few, or how much money it is going to cost the Treasury. If we owe this debt, we ought to pay it.

The very able Senator from Pennsylvania—who, I believe, has studied all these matters as thoroughly as anyone in this Chamber—has based his opposition to this bill on the question of discrimination; first, the discrimination between officers and enlisted men; second, the discrimination between emergency officers themselves.

Mr. President, if a discrimination exists between officers and enlisted men, it is no new discrimination. It is one that has existed at all times. This bill does not purport to do away with any such discrimination. If it is the opinion of the Senate that such a discrimination should be done away with, let them do away with it with regard to the Regular Army and with regard to the emergency officers. This legislation does not go into that at all. We are dealing with one particular problem. We are doing away with one particular discrimination—namely, the discrimination which exists at present between officers in the Regular service and the emergency officers who served with them, and endured the same risks and hardships and dangers and disabilities that the officers in the Regular service did.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania brought up another argument with which, to a certain extent, I am in sympathy. When you set an arbitrary line at 30 per cent, it is natural that you are going to have cases where hardship has been inflicted on one side or the other of the line.

We have heard at great length about the major who was a bacteriologist, and heard him compared with a major who was a chemist; and it was very clearly shown that they were not being treated fairly according to the present regulations of the Veterans' Bureau, and that that unfairness would be increased fivefold by this bill. That is true, Mr. President. Personally I should favor the bill as it was originally indorsed by the American Legion, not going into technicalities of percentage disability but giving the emergency officers exactly the same privilege which is enjoyed by the Regular officers.

We have not that bill before us, however. We have a bill drawing the line at 30 per cent; and the discriminations at 30 per cent are not materially more unfair than they would be if you drew any other particular line of cleavage. If you reduce the retirement rate to 29 per cent, or 28 per cent, or 27 per cent, you are still going to have individual cases of hardship as between men who come on one or the other side of that particular line.

The Senator from Pennsylvania said that he wanted to explain not only what the bill did do, but what it did not do. Mr. President, I am for this bill on account of what it does do, and I am not going to oppose it on account of what it does not do and does not pretend to do, and what no ex-service man that I know of thinks that it is meant to do.

This bill deals with a very small part of the problem of the ex-service man. It deals with 3,000 emergency officers, and it tries to do away with the discrimination between them and the Regular officers who had the same experiences and the same hardships in the war. It does not go any further.

A number of Senators have said that the enlisted men are opposed to the bill. That has not been my experience. I had the honor of attending the first caucus of the American Legion at St. Louis in May, 1919; and I think this bill was sponsored in the first place by an enlisted man in the New Mexico delegation to that convention. Since then it has been up in the Senate and up in the House of Representatives a good many times. The enlisted men all over the country have had a chance to become acquainted with the bill. I think my colleague here knows, as I do, that out of the 18,000 ex-service men in New Mexico there are not more than between 25 and 30 who would benefit by this particular bill; but I have found that all the rest are thoroughly in favor of it, that they understand it, and that they want it brought to a vote. They know that it is not going to benefit the enlisted man. If there is some other bill which will benefit the enlisted men, both in the Regular service and in the temporary service, I believe that I will go as far in supporting it as any Senator in this Chamber; but this bill deals with a particular problem. I am going to vote for this bill, and I hope other Senators will vote for it, because as far as it goes it is right in principle, even though it may not go as far as some of us would like.

I hope this bill will pass by the same overwhelming majority by which it was passed in previous sessions of Congress.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of this retirement bill for emergency officers. I believe that it will bring about long-delayed justice. Army officers of practically every other branch of the service have been taken care of by legislative enactment; and I think it is time that the emergency officers should be taken care of, too, in the way of a retirement measure.

There is no question but that these emergency officers rendered good service during the war; that they were called from their business, whatever it was, and went into the service the same as others did; and I believe they are entitled to recognition.

I want to read just a brief extract from a letter I have received from a constituent of mine, which is a sample of a number of other letters I have received. It is from a young man who was a civil engineer, and after taking a course in an officers' training camp went into the Government service and served throughout the war. He says:

On September 2, 1920, I was discharged from the Army on a surgeon's certificate of disability marked 30 per cent disabled. I could not return to the practice of my profession of engineering, but instead had to move out to New Mexico, upon the advice of physicians, in order to be enabled to live. I spent two years in New Mexico and then took up the work of teaching, which I have been following since.

In October, 1924, the United States Veterans' Bureau at Washington, D. C., awarded me a permanent disability rating of 50 per cent, and I have been receiving compensation for that rating since that time.

Had I been in the Regular Army I would have been retired as a disabled officer and would have received retirement pay for my rank beginning with the date of my discharge from the Army hospital in September, 1920.

I was commissioned from civil life into the Corps of Engineers of the Army which is ample proof that I had the necessary technical qualifications in addition to the other qualifications of an Engineer officer. That I was in actual and responsible charge of the military mapping of the southern department, United States Army, for some 20 months—work of a very confidential as well as a highly technical nature—would indicate that I carried on quite capably in every way. During that period I proudly and gladly performed every duty and arduous task and accepted every risk and responsibility shoulder to shoulder with the commissioned officers of the Regular Army. Wherever and whenever there was work to do, I was spared in no way.

My case is typical of those of many other emergency officers of the World War. So long as the war was in progress, nothing was too good for them; but as soon as the war was over and their services were no longer needed to help, guide, and direct the Army, they were discharged on a basis that denied them all of the rights, benefits, and privileges that go with the position of a commissioned officer in the Regular Army.

Mr. President, I believe this bill should be passed, and I trust that it will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROOKHART in the chair). The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HALE, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War."

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE JUDGE RHYDON MAYS CALL

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in memory of Rhydon Mays Call, late judge of the United States District Court of the Southern District of Florida, a special service was held at 10 o'clock Saturday, January 14, 1928, in the Federal court room in the city of Jacksonville. Hon. Lake Jones, judge of the United States District Court of the Southern District of Florida, presided, and on the bench with him were Hon. George Couper Gibbs, Hon. Daniel A. Simmons, and Hon. DeWitt T. Gray, judges of the circuit court for the fourth judicial circuit of the State of Florida.

Members of the bar from every part of the State were present, as were other friends of the late Judge Call. Proceedings were reported by Raleigh C. Dowling, Ralph W. Pattison, and Earnest L. Bryant. The court having been convened by the United States deputy marshal, Judge John L. Doggett delivered the following just and impressive tribute to the memory of that eminent judge, patriotic citizen, and much-loved man, whose life was rich in public service, which I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROOKHART in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

Judge DOGGETT. If your honors please, my brother lawyers, ladies, and gentlemen, the letter from the joint committees of the bar requested me on this occasion to pay a fitting tribute to Judge Call's memory, and voice the respect in which he was held, and the grief occasioned by his loss.

I wish that I could adequately and appropriately put the words into sentences that would make you feel that I had accomplished such a mission. Oh, how I yearn for the power at this moment to express the tribute and voice the respect and grief that this occasion demands. If I fail, I believe he at least would believe if he were here that only my limitations of mind were the obstacles that prevented such performance, for at no moment throughout my life could my heart have been more attuned and in harmony with my effort than it is at this moment.

People are born, live their whole life out, and die, and when the then living contemplate and look back over those careers generally it is that all seem about the same, and are, at best, but commonplace.

Occasionally, however, it appears that a man is sent into the world with a particular work to perform. To my mind Rhydon M. Call had a mission of that kind—the accomplishment of justice.

There is an old maxim that I believe is attributed to Mahomet, which says that "one hour in the execution of justice is worth 70 years of prayer."

If such be the case, what a wealth of example did we enjoy as lawyers throughout his long judicial career, and what a loss did we sustain in Rhydon Call's death. No man can perform justice without an understanding of what justice is, and no man can understand justice to its fullest extent unless he has learned to drink uncomplainingly the bitter draughts of deep sorrow, producing an aloneness in the world, resulting in the deepest of meditation, and an unselfish and impartial accounting to and of one's self and of his fellowmen and of their affairs.

Out of such despairing experience and disasters did Rhydon M. Call, the judge, emerge, but without a complaint, and with only silent, grim determination written on his face and engraved within his heart, to live on and on to the end—alone. Oh, so alone, but calmly, most efficiently and wonderfully, making his judicial life his whole life, since he felt and was so alone.

If I went into details, whether in chambers or on the bench, of his daily routine, we would see that familiar figure sitting there, somewhat hunched over in his chair, with eyes cast down, calmly whittling his favorite piece of wood—red cedar—listening intently and patiently, and completely absorbed with what he was hearing. Never was he known to make a memorandum. He had acquired the habit of concentration to such a marked degree that he needed no reminder as to argument or incident. Seldom it was that he ever asked a question and still more seldom did he ever of his own volition interrupt counsel. He would rule but once in the trial of a case on a question of evidence, and that would remain the guide on that proposition throughout the trial. We who practiced before him knew this only too well, and we would never attempt the same question in another form even without an explanation to the court. Argument with him as to his ruling spelled instant reprimand, generally only by the raising of his eyes, which at such a moment it would seem that he was looking both through and into each and all of the internals of one's body and saying to those internals, "I've ruled; that ends the matter. You have your exception."

His insight and memory at times seemed almost uncanny, and his wisdom, fortified by his knowledge, frequently muttered in a low tone, was at times so disconcerting that it spelled instant disaster to an unrighteous cause. His place of worship was the shrine of justice, and justice was always his client, not the sentimental blubbering kind, not the kind that rode on the top of a hurrahing temporary wave of public approval, not the kind which is illustrated by the following incident—I feel sure you will all understand. A young judge was sitting in a case in a rural community where lawyers of note were trying a case of moment and one involving questions that would affect a policy of the State. One of these lawyers offered an objection and the judge promptly ruled with him. This lawyer was so elated that he offered another objection and was promptly ruled against, and upon his showing an inclination to argue with the court, the judge said, "Why, I have just ruled with you once. I must rule with the other fellow this time."

Justice from the bench is not such an evening-up process with the Judge Call kind of nisi prius judge.

When properly applied, it purposes an unbroken and even career, guided by a dignity of ethical and moral feeling, founded upon logical thinking, tempered with the human element, embellished with scholarly attainment, nourished with an unwavering determination to follow the law as it is revealed and finally pronounced by a he-man. Such was the rugged justice that was administered throughout the long and remarkable career of Rhydon M. Call. Such could properly be a summary of the Rhydon Call type of justice.

People individually, be they lawyer or client, meant nothing in his judicial career, subject matter alone determined his judgment. His life was one of constant, never-ceasing contact with the human being and his cause of action; and out of his abundant experience with the strength and weaknesses of causes, the motives and the desires thereof, the hopes and passions therein, with an unerring eye always upon the straight course of the law, he would emerge from his deliberations with a decision that always brought with it the respect of lawyer and client, and most frequently such a conviction of its righteousness and legality that the litigation would end with his decision. Such was the judicial force of Rhydon M. Call.

We who practiced constantly before him know that it can not be exaggeration when we say that he contributed more to the bringing about of respect for the judiciary in this State than did any other man who ever lived.

I mean that respect and confidence under our form of government that lawyers at least realize is fundamental to the perpetuation of our whole judicial scheme.

So thoroughly have I believe this that I have frequently stated that if we had a Rhydon M. Call on every State and Federal bench throughout this Nation that socialism would die aborning or perish in a desert of disappointment and bolshevism would growl itself into perpetual oblivion, gnawing a bone of decreasing dissatisfaction upon the trash heap of discarded governmental notions.

He eschewed always the half-baked and far-fetched theories and kept his eye always steadfast upon the rock-ribbed principles of the Constitution as interpreted by the fathers.

No fine-spinning theorists in constitutional law, no smartish mental quick-change arguing artists, no specious reasoner in legal trash could ever shake him on his firm foundation nor reap any greater harvest than a dignified and respectful hearing.

People generally felt that he was their Rock of Gibraltar and sole security and harbor of safety in time of trouble. May I ask how deeply also must they feel his loss?

No greater responsibility ever rested upon a President so far as its effect on the people of one State is concerned than filling the position left vacant by the death of Rhydon M. Call. Our President may not know it and appreciate it, but we who have lived our lives in this State, particularly in the law, know it and know it only too well.

I shall touch but gently the personal life of the man for that was personal to him and to him alone does it belong. I can not refrain from noting, however, one characteristic that was never discovered except by a few of his closest and most intimate personal associates.

You who knew him only as an apparently immobile, silent, patient, stern, restrained, almost granitelike, dignified judge will doubtless be surprised to know that in an appropriate atmosphere and at a time when only a few persons he was fond of were around him, and particularly during the moments of enjoyment of the great outdoors, both waterways and woods, he would unbend the exhibit of a boyish ruggedness that made him a most attractive and fun-making companion.

At such times he would scuffle and wrestle with the nearest at hand, roll upon the floor or ground with them, laughing in his quiet way, and run away from them and back again just as a boy of 15 might do.

These outbursts were seldom, yet they were only measured by the appropriateness of the occasion and by the people who were with him.

He was at all times a most entertaining talker when he would talk, and particularly did his extensive literary reading afford him a vast store of information to draw upon as topics of conversation.

About his principal philosophy in life, which he ever followed and practiced, is best found in the well-known stanza from James Whitcomb Riley—

It hain't no use to grumble and complain,
It's jest as cheap and easy to rejoice.
When God sorts out the weather and sends rain
Why, rain's my choice.

But he, this nisi prius genius, is now gathered to his fathers and lives only to the bench and the bar in its grateful remembrance and his own bright example.

While living a life of study meekness and despite his constant modesty and self-nullification he built a lasting monument to himself in the minds of those who survive him; but may I suggest that we perpetuate for posterity in enduring bronze to be erected, perhaps in this court room or in some park of the city, some appropriate memento of his most remarkable judicial career.

Nations, States, and even communities do these things to commemorate the lives of their most distinguished and exceptional citizens. Can we, as lawyers, think of a life more worthy of such commemoration? I commend this to your earnest consideration, to the end that a committee be appointed with plenary powers to fittingly round out the expression of the bar in great respect for and appreciation of the judicial labor and life of Rhydon M. Call, the judge.

And now, may I heartily and without reservation say in closing that whoever may be chosen as his successor I can conceive of no greater boon that could come to him and to the people of Florida than that, if it be possible for the souls of those who depart to return and exercise a beneficient influence, that I pray that the gates to the place of abode of souls of righteous judges shall always remain open so that the judicial spirit of Rhydon M. Call may at all times be able to wing its flight back and ever hover around his successor, giving to him at all times the same pure, sane, wise, unbiased, and unprejudiced judicial judgment that in his lifetime Judge Rhydon M. Call invariably pronounced from this bench.

BOILERS FROM MUNICIPAL HOSPITAL, MUSKOGEE, OKLA.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there is on the Vice President's desk H. R. 4964, to authorize the city of Muskogee, Okla., to remove and retain title to the boilers from the Municipal Hospital Building recently conveyed by the city to the United States Veterans' Bureau Hospital No. 90, at Muskogee, Okla. A similar bill is on the Senate calendar, reported by the Committee on Finance. The bill is an emergency measure. The Senate bill has an amendment which I desire to have attached to the House bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 4964.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that the amendment desired is one that was suggested by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 4964) to authorize the city of Muskogee, Okla., to remove and retain title to the boilers from the Municipal Hospital Building recently conveyed by the city to the United States Veterans' Bureau Hospital No. 90, at Muskogee, Okla., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Muskogee, Okla., through its authorized representatives, be, and it is hereby, authorized to remove from the Municipal Hospital Building, recently sold by said city to the United States Veterans' Bureau Hospital No. 90, at Muskogee, Okla., and retain title to the boilers in said Municipal Hospital Building, having been reserved when the sale of said hospital building was consummated, but which reservation was erroneously omitted from the deed conveying said Municipal Hospital Building from said city to the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 90.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest that the amendment which I send to the clerk's desk be attached at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the bill, the following:

That such removal shall be at the expense of the city, and shall not be undertaken until other arrangements for heating this hospital have been made by the United States Veterans' Bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 1768 will be indefinitely postponed.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 16, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, March 15, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed, blessed Father in Heaven, Thou dost put Thy shoulder under our burdens and givest help and support to every seeking heart. In our meditations, in our prayers, and in our labors may we turn to Thee with true discernment and with a living faith. We give Thee thanks and praise for Thy guiding hand along the pathway of life's pilgrimage. Impress us with the truth—ever old and ever new—of Thy goodness, the restful joys of repentence, and the wonderful rewards of obedience to Thy law, and the sweet satisfaction that blesses the life whose companionship is with Thee. Be our pillar of cloud by day and our pillar of fire by night, that we may wage successful warfare against the invasions of lust, self-indulgence and lawlessness, and every fearful wrong which disfigures humanity and robs God. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the independent offices appropriation bill be taken from the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments disagreed to, the further conference asked for by the Senate agreed to, and the conferees appointed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the bill H. R. 9481, the independent offices appropriation bill, with Senate amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments disagreed to, and the further conference asked for by the Senate agreed to, and conferees appointed. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the gentleman's request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9481, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the further conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Have the House conferees agreed to the amendment of the Senate as to the Shipping Board's seaman's bureau?

Mr. WOOD. The conference report was agreed upon. The Senate adopted the conference report. It came back here before we had time to agree to the report. The Senate have asked for a further conference.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman insist on a disagreement?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think you can ask him that. It is a parliamentary amendment as to procedure.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is that the only thing in disagreement?

Mr. MADDEN. There are several other amendments.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Shall we have an opportunity to vote on them?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We hope so.

Mr. MADDEN. We can not promise that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WOOD, Mr. WASON, and Mr. CULLEN.

MINORITY VIEWS ON THE BILL H. R. 5773

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed 10 days in which to prepare and file my minority views upon the bill H. R. 5773, better known as the Boulder Dam bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, has the majority report been filed?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. It will be filed to-day. I am making this request to-day; otherwise I would lose my right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I also may have 10 legislative days within which I may file my minority views on the bill H. R. 5773.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to be allowed 10 legislative days within which to file his minority views on the bill referred to.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That is also on the Boulder Dam.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to present a resolution of the legislature of my State.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. On what subject?

Mr. LOWREY. Presenting a resolution passed by the legislature of our State.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We often receive resolutions from our States. That is very common, and yet we do not print them in the RECORD.

Mr. LOWREY. It is in regard to cotton.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I read Senate Concurrent Resolution 13, passed by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, memorializing the Congress of the United States to investigate the Department of Agriculture and to prevent the Department of Agriculture from making unwarranted statements that will affect the price of cotton:

Whereas the Department of Agriculture of our Federal Government had gained the confidence of the farmers and the business men of the South; and

Whereas that confidence was justified so long as that department of the Federal Government restricted its activities to its duties delegated to it by Congress; and

Whereas during the fall of 1927 the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States exceeded his authority by predicting the trend of low prices in the near future for cotton and cotton products and by issuing a statement which appears to have been erroneous concerning cotton consumption that was ill advised and apparently from private or interested sources—all of which were nothing more than guesses; and

Whereas as a result of said statements or guesses of the Secretary of Agriculture as to the trend of prices and consumption of cotton the farmers throughout the South lost millions of dollars; and

Whereas the making of such statements or guesses is improper and is a vital question to the entire South: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Mississippi (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That it is the sense and the opinion of the Legislature of Mississippi, as the representatives of the people of this State, that the entire people of the State of Mississippi disapprove of said unwarranted activities of the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture in making statements or guesses as aforesaid, and that we respectfully memorialize Congress to condemn such activities and to make an investigation of said department or to take such steps as may appear necessary to prevent a recurrence of such activities on the part of the Department of Agriculture of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent immediately to the President of the United States, and to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing resolution is a true and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution 13, passed by the senate on the 23d day of February, 1928, and by the house of representatives on the 9th day of March, 1928.

H. E. KING, Secretary of Senate.

Of course, we all understand that the matter referred to in this resolution has been taken care of by an amendment placed in the recent agricultural bill, but I wanted to present this statement showing the feeling of the legislature and the people of Mississippi, and simply to say that the Department of Agriculture has done great things for the farmer, but if it is going to make many breaks like the one referred to in this resolution then it is a luxury that we can ill afford. I believe the sentiments expressed in this resolution are the sentiments of the people of the cotton States generally. [Applause.]

A SCHOOL TO TRAIN SOLDIERS TO BE OFFICERS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD with reference to H. R. 12042, a bill to provide further for the national defense.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I have sought this opportunity to explain the provisions of H. R. 12042, and in order that the readers of the RECORD may have the bill itself before reading my remarks, I am herewith inserting the bill itself:

H. R. 12042, Seventieth Congress, first session

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 13, 1928.

Mr. McSWAIN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

A bill to establish a school for soldiers and to provide further for the national defense

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to establish at Fort D. A. Russell, in the State of Wyoming, a school for the education and training of enlisted men to qualify them for commissions as officers in the United States Army, to be known as the United States Army school for soldiers.

SEC. 2. That no person shall be eligible to be admitted to said school unless he shall have served as an enlisted man at least two years and shall be not less than 20 years old or no more than 25 years old and unmarried; and the course of study shall continue through four years and shall cover such scientific, literary, historical, and philosophical courses as shall be calculated to develop the mind, inspire the heart, and strengthen the character of the student, and to qualify him for leadership in the Army.

SEC. 3. That for the first year, beginning July 1, 1930, the Secretary of War shall direct publication in advance by newspaper, service journals, bulletins, and by oral announcement in all the organizations of the United States Army of the opening of said school and shall require company commanders to report to the various regimental commanders the names of all enlisted men that may apply for admission to such school with their recommendations and ratings as to each soldier; and thereupon the regimental commanders shall conduct examinations according to uniform questions prepared by the War Department for the purpose of ascertaining the educational qualifications of such enlisted men as shall make application for entrance to said school, and the result of said examination, along with a copy of the service record and other information relating to the personal history, ratings, typical make-up, and character of the soldier as may bear relation to his fitness to become an officer in the United States Army, shall be sent to the Secretary of War; and from the total number, the Secretary of War shall select 400 soldiers to be students in said college, if so many be qualified, and order their detail from their organizations as students, and if the periods of their enlistment will expire prior to the end of the four-year course at said school, then, before being admitted to said school, all such soldiers shall first enlist for such additional period as shall end with the expiration of said four-year course.

SEC. 4. If any of such student soldiers shall fail to profit by the course of instruction, or shall so conduct themselves as to be unworthy of the opportunity being afforded them, they shall immediately be detached from said school and returned to their organizations to serve out the unexpired term of enlistment.

SEC. 5. At the beginning of each subsequent scholastic year, to wit, July 1 of each year, the Secretary of War in like manner shall select the names of 200 other soldiers and shall order their detail as students in said school, and thereafter at the beginning of each scholastic year 200 such soldiers shall be detached from their organizations and detailed as students in said school; and so on from year to year, so that the number of students in said school after the same shall have been in operation for a period of five years will be approximately 800.

SEC. 6. All such soldiers as shall graduate at such school shall have the same and equal opportunity to be commissioned as officers in the United States Army as the graduates of the United States Military Academy at West Point, and if there be, from the sources now available and from those that will hereby become available, a larger number of persons applying for commissions than there be vacancies in the United States Army, then the Secretary of War shall select from all of said sources, without respect to the institutions where they may have graduated, those persons that shall show by their service records, personal history, and school ratings, not only in scholarship but in deportment, in character, age, and experience, and in the other elements of leadership, the highest qualifications for exercising the responsibilities of officers in the United States Army.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of War shall detail a general officer of the line to be superintendent of said school for soldiers, and in addition shall detail such other officers and noncommissioned officers and privates of the Regular Army as may be necessary to administer the affairs of said school, and also to assist in the teaching at said school; and the Secretary of War is authorized and empowered to employ not exceeding six civilian professors, who shall be heads of their respective departments and supervise the teaching in the following departments: (1) English literature and general history; (2) chemistry and physics; (3) foreign languages; (4) mathematics and civil engineering; (5) biology, hygiene, and sanitation; (6) constitutional, military, and international law.

Under the direction of the superintendent, officers detailed for that purpose shall give instruction and training in drill, discipline, tactics, and strategy, and in such other related subjects as will tend to qualify the student soldiers to become second lieutenants in the United States Army.

SEC. 8. All soldiers shall, six months after enlistment, be given a full opportunity to file with their respective commanding officers a written notice of their desire to become student soldiers in said school for soldiers, and thereafter all soldiers having given such notice shall be allowed full and free opportunity and afforded all reasonable assistance in order to prepare and qualify themselves for entrance into said school for soldiers.

SEC. 9. The Secretary of War shall annually appoint a board of visitors consisting of nine educators to inspect said school during the month of August, and said board of visitors shall be required to make both oral and written suggestions to the faculty and to the Secretary of War concerning such matter taught and the methods employed in said school for soldiers, and so much of the report of said board of visitors shall be printed as a part of the report of the Secretary of War to Congress; and the members of said board of visitors shall be allowed only their actual traveling and hotel expenses incurred while serving as such.

SEC. 10. All students in said school for soldiers shall be officially known by the War Department as student soldiers, and shall be neatly uniformed and equipped, and furnished with all necessary books, stationery, equipment, apparatus, and material for the proper carrying on of their studies in said school for soldiers, and in addition shall receive in cash the pay that they were receiving when detailed to said school for soldiers. All such student soldiers shall pursue the same four-year course, unless sooner released and returned to their organizations, and shall be given by the military authorities and by the heads of departments ample opportunity to develop personal initiative, self-reliance, and leadership, and the habit of original investigation and thought.

SEC. 11. The superintendent of said school for soldiers shall annually submit through the President to the Bureau of the Budget an estimate of the expenses of said school for the next succeeding year, and the same, with such changes as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, shall, after revision by said Bureau of the Budget, be submitted as a part of the estimate of the War Department expenses.

SEC. 12. The sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of constructing a school building for the teaching of the scientific subjects required to be taught, including laboratories and experimental rooms and apparatus in connection therewith; and the further sum of $100,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of making such necessary changes in the existing buildings as the same may require, and all other appropriations hereafter found necessary for the improvement, encouragement, expansion, and development of said school for soldiers are hereby authorized to be made.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to increase the efficiency of our national defense forces. It is admitted on every side that there should be an increase in such efficiency. From all groups and sections and parts of the Army come reports that the Army is in a low state of morale. The officers report this, and while the enlisted personnel have not made any report from that quarter, actions speak louder than words.

The attached news item recently appearing in the daily newspapers of Washington and evidently originating from some authority in the War Department, indicates the state of mind of the enlisted men:

DESERTIONS FROM ARMY REPORTED ON INCREASE—8.25 PER CENT RATE EXPECTED IF THE PRESENT TREND IS CONTINUED—MORALE DECLARED HIGH

Quite unexpectedly, and much to chagrin of the military authorities, desertions from the Army have been increasing since the first of this year. The indications are, if they continue in those proportions during the remainder of this fiscal year, the desertion rate for the period January 1 to June 30 will be about 8.25, as compared with the highest rate of 7.39 in recent years.

Apparently, improvement in the Army ration has not been effective in keeping down desertions from the Army. Beginning with this fiscal year, the 50-cent ration went into full effect; and notwithstanding the surprising increase in desertions, it has had a beneficial effect upon the men of the Army. The Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and other officers appearing before the House Appropriations Committee in December, wishing to emphasize the good effect of the improved ration, were unanimous in stating that the morale of the Army was very high and that desertions were running very low.

Therefore the increase in the desertion rate since January 1 comes as a distinct surprise, especially in view of the fact that unfavorable labor conditions and less general employment usually reduce desertions and stimulate recruiting.

There is some reason for this state of affairs in the Army. The records for the past five years will show that the average desertions have been about 10 per cent, and as the average enlistments have amounted to about 20 per cent, it means on the average that one-half of all the men that enlist in the Army desert. This not only deserves an explanation, but it deserves a serious effort at correction.

On the other hand, the officers do not desert. On the contrary, there is a very general desire on the part of many officers that served during the World War and also on the part of recent graduates from military schools, to obtain commissions in the Regular Army. In fact, commissions in the Regular Army are much sought after. There are three reasons at least, if not more, for this:

First, economic; second, social; third, proper and praiseworthy ambition.

I believe that by properly using these motives, the enlisted and officer personnel of the Army may be greatly uplifted and improved.

It is a fact that a commission in the Regular Army has very high economic value. Let us consider the facts. There is a steady and certain income from the day an officer is commissioned second lieutenant until the day of his death, provided he is not dishonorably discharged after a court-martial—a thing that very seldom happens. He is certain to receive an increase in pay and a rise in rank with the passage of years. He has a fair prospect of finally being commissioned a general officer, and certainly will retire at the age of 64 on three-fourths of his pay, which will be ample to provide for every reasonable need. While he is in the service, light, heat, and quarters are provided, or commuted for in cash. Medical services and medicine are provided. Surgeons, hospitals, and nurses are provided in the event of sickness or accident. A funeral in a national cemetery with military honors is provided, with six months' pay to the surviving family. Where else in the business world is such advantage to be found?

If to this should be added the cost and expenses of a four-year course at West Point Military Academy, and of the various service schools after being commissioned, it might be easily ascertained that the economic value of a commission as second lieutenant to a young man 24 years of age is a magnificent estate; it is a fortune of large cash proportions. In fact, in many respects it is better than cash itself. There is great responsibility and much hazard in the handling of an estate. There is much care and annoyance over the selection of safe and profitable investments. Even the wisest heads are deceived and the fortune flies upon the wind. But the Treasury of the United States is an unfailing paymaster. Whether the economic conditions in the country are good or bad, the pay check comes every month. Farmers may be in distress, merchants may be in bankruptcy, banks may be failing, stocks and bonds may go begging for buyers and fall to the bottom of values, but the pay check to the Army officer issues with the regularity of the calendar from the Treasury of the United States.

Up until within a few years ago commissions in the British Army were sold for cash and the money put into the treasury of the Government. Newspaper reports a few months ago were to the effect that baronetcies, knighthoods, and titles of nobility generally were granted by the British crown in recognition of aid to the Government during the World War, and by some coincidence the recipients were always very rich men, and it was ascertained later that a fund of millions of dollars was created by these honored citizens and this fund is retained and employed as operating capital for one of the great British political parties.

Now, commissioned rank in any army is a place of quasi-nobility. In France, where the republican ideas of Rousseau, Voltaire, and Diderot still dominate the political thinking of the people, young men descended from the old Bourbon aristocracy that was crushed by the French Revolution in 1789, seek eagerly commissions in the French Army and receive very low salaries while junior officers. But they are induced to do so on account of the social advantages of commissioned rank in the army. It is the modern substitute in France for the feudal aristocracy. Such state of mind is similar throughout the world.

The profession of arms is ancient and honorable. Its picturesque aspects, its appeal to the heroic, its patriotic setting, and its public character all tend to lift the commissioned personnel of the Army and the Navy above the rank and file of the masses of humanity from which they spring.

In addition, a commission in the Army is a promise of opportunity to gratify a commendable ambition. Every second lieutenant should and does doubtless contemplate the possibility, he hopes the probability, of an opportunity to write his name high on the roll of fame by some daring and noble deed or course of service for his country.

Thus all three motives of financial and monetary advantage, of social elevation and enjoyment, and of worthy desire for fame and glory, combine to create a widespread desire to become an officer in the United States Army. I am not speaking from imagination, but from facts. In the last seven years hundreds of young men, about half of whom had seen World War service and the other half having received military education, have applied to me for information as to how they might receive a commission in the Army. This fact turned me to the study of the reasons and motives back of it all, and I feel quite confident that my conclusions are justified. Other reasons and facts could be mentioned and may be mentioned in the future by me in support of my conclusions.

Hence, I have meditated long upon some plan of how to utilize this great desire to be commissioned as officers in the United States Army for the good of the Army as a whole, and therefore for the good of the country. At the very threshold I was struck by the high percentage of desertions by enlisted men from the Army. I found enlisted men eager to the point of desertion to get out of the Army, and I found hundreds eager to employ any and every means possible to get into the Army as commissioned officers.

Naturally I asked why this strange contrast of feeling. I therefore conceived a plan of employing this very strong desire to become officers in the Army to stabilize the enlisted personnel of the Army, to elevate its educational qualifications, and perhaps other qualifications, and in consequence to reduce materially and perhaps practically wipe out desertions by enlisted men. Then it was a natural course of reasoning for me to ask: Why not require those desiring to be commissioned in the Army to pass through the ranks, and while in the ranks to undergo a sifting and searching process of elimination? Obviously it is impracticable under existing conditions to reorganize the entire framework of the Army and to require that all who may receive commissions should have served previously as enlisted men. But I do conceive that it is practicable and reasonable to require that a portion of those who come up annually for consideration for commissions in the Army shall have passed through the grade of enlisted men.

I am printing the following letter from The Adjutant General as to the sources from which were obtained the 357 persons who were commissioned as second lieutenants in the Regular Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927. Of these it appears that only 40 ever served as enlisted men in the Regular Army, unless perhaps a few of the 203 graduates of the United States Military Academy had been appointed from the Regular Army. Thus it appears that only a little more than 10 per cent of the young men commissioned as second lieutenants last year had served as enlisted men in the Regular Army and therefore understand the point of view of the enlisted men:

FEBRUARY 24, 1928.

Hon. J. J. McSWAIN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. McSWAIN: I have your letter of February 20 and have obtained from the records the data which you desire.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, 357 persons were commissioned as second lieutenants in the Regular Army. Of this number, 203 were graduates of the United States Military Academy; 39 were honor graduates of selected educational institutions maintaining senior units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; 24 were graduates of educational institutions maintaining senior units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; 29 were enlisted men of the Regular Army with at least two years' service as such; 11 were enlisted men of the Regular Army with less than two years' service as such; 6 were members of the National Guard; and the remaining 45 were civilians of other status.

As compiled from the records of promotions during the past 5 years, the average length of time served by a second lieutenant before reaching the grade of first lieutenant is 4 years and 9 months, and before reaching the grade of captain 10 years.

I am pleased to be of service to you in this matter.

Very respectfully,

LUTZ WAHL,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

What business institution, such as a railroad, bank, factory, or mercantile establishment, would be able to induce educated, ambitious, and honorable young men to enter at the bottom of the ladder and to work upward from the bottom when there faced every such young man that commenced at the bottom the fact that he had a chance of only 1 out of every 10 ever to get to the top? Undoubtedly such fact would be too discouraging. We know that the bank presidents as a class started at the bottom; we know that the railroad presidents started at the bottom; we know that the merchant princes began as sweepers or cash boys; we know that the great captains of industry realized in their hearts while still day laborers in early manhood that by thrift, energy, fidelity, and ability they might climb to the top. Human nature must work in the Army as in every other branch of human existence. Therefore let us open a reasonable and fair and just avenue and means of approach, so that the enlisted man may hope within a reasonable time, if his ability and character justify it, to receive a commission, and then to advance by the steady and certain, though slow, method of seniority.

Consequently I have introduced H. R. 12042, to create a school for enlisted men, and to say to the graduates of high schools throughout the country who desire the Army as a career, and who are unable for many reasons to obtain an appointment to West Point, that if they will come into the Regular Army as enlisted men and serve at least two years, they have a chance to win the respect and confidence of their company and regimental commanders and would be recommended for admission to a nation-wide contest among the enlisted men of the Army and be designated as a "student soldier" in said school for soldiers.

Taking all qualifications as set out in said bill into consideration, if the young man is designated as a student in said school and if he finishes the course of four years he will have an equal chance at a commission in the Army with the graduates of West Point. My plan would contemplate the entry by enlistment into the Army by young men at about the age of 18, of course with the consent of their parents. After six months they would indicate in writing their desire to be candidates for detail as student soldiers. They would be given reasonable opportunity for study and self-improvement and preparation for the examination. If successful, the soldier would be about 20 years of age, perhaps 21 or 22, when detailed to attend the school. Thus the soldier would be about 24, 25, or 26 years old upon graduation. Thus the graduates of the school for soldiers would be slightly older than the graduates of the United States Military Academy. They would have had an equally good college education. They would have had the additional experience as enlisted men. In my judgment, they certainly would make equally as good officers as the graduates of the Military Academy for the same year. If the number of graduates at said school and from the Military Academy and from other sources aggregated more than the total number of vacancies, then the Secretary of War would pick those that seemed to him best qualified from every point of view to become officers and would discharge the others into civilian life. They could not complain of being rejected in the final test. They will have received an education that cost the United States Government many thousands of dollars. They would thus be ahead to that extent of other young men of their own age and station in life. The net result would be that the Army would receive the very choicest of all the young men thus qualified. Thus this competitive race for commissions on the basis of qualifications and character and merit would undoubtedly elevate the average qualifications in these respects of the officer personnel. Since it would surely enlist better-qualified recruits, it would improve the Army from bottom to top.

The bill that I have introduced to establish a great national "school for soldiers," occupying the splendid buildings at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., which will probably be vacated for all practical military post purposes within two or three years, is a measure of the highest importance in the interest of national defense. It is solely to promote national defense.

National defense requires the maintenance of a standing Army of about the present size, certainly no greater. The degree of defense obtained depends upon the efficiency of that Army. The efficiency of that Army rests upon the efficiency of its entire personnel, from the lowliest private to the highest ranking general. In fact, the theory of our small standing Army is not that it is large enough to do any independent fighting in the event of war but that it is a training force to assist in organizing and training the great civilian reserves to fight.

Therefore the standing Army ought to be an organization of the highest qualifications; that is, all of the members of that Army, from privates to generals, ought to be men of intelligence and character and leadership. Not only ought the officers to be educated but the privates also ought to be educated, certainly to the extent of a high-school education, which is now within the reach of every ambitious boy in America to-day.

This is said in no spirit of bitter criticism, but as the mere recording of an unfortunate fact, that the desertions from the Regular Army for the last several years constitute a national disgrace. Soldiery is an ancient and honorable profession. When practically 10 per cent of the enlisted strength of an army desert annually in years of peace it is a fact to cause thinking people to stop and inquire what is the cause.

The bill that I have introduced to erect a great "school for soldiers" will be the largest factor in correcting this disease of desertion and will lift the personnel of the Army from the top to the bottom. I have talked with scores of enlisted men that have deserted and have tried to find out just what was the real trouble. There must be some basic general cause. It is not merely an individual problem, because the percentage of desertions is too high. I find that the cause is not inadequate housing facilities. The cause is not inadequate pay. The cause is not the work that the soldier is expected to do and required to do. The general, efficient cause is that the soldier is led to believe that the Army is a great opportunity for self-improvement through travel and study and to learn a trade in shops and by working with machines and firearms. The average American boy of 19 or 20 years of age has a serious conception of his obligation as a man to be self-sustaining and a breadwinner and a home maker for a family. Finding his opportunities and prospects apparently greatly limited at home, and being lured on by attractive pictures and circulars, and by the honeyed words of the recruiting officer, he joins the Army, often without the knowledge or consent of his family and often by misrepresenting his age, and soon finds that the picture was extravagantly overdrawn.

The recruit in the Army soon finds that his prospects for learning through travel are limited. When he travels he may merely peep through a car window or over the side of a boat. "Seeing the world through a porthole" becomes a very monotonous fact.

He finds himself hardly a cog in a wheel; hardly a speck in a mass; hardly a unit in a huge organization. He finds his individuality repressed and suppressed and consequently his mentality becomes depressed. He finds that there is no chance, or practically no chance, for him to ever be anything else but a private soldier. He finds that in the Regular Army a private soldier is about the lowest stratum of American citizenship. He finds that the rights of civilians are respected and their feelings are considered; but he finds that oftentimes his own rights and feelings are subject to the caprice and whim of some young officer but little older, if any, than himself, no better than himself morally, and yet merely more fortunate than himself. Therefore this private soldier becomes desperate. In consequence he deserts. Thereby he is disgraced for life; thereby the Army is disgraced; thereby the Nation is disgraced.

The ideal of American democracy in politics, in business, and in the professions is that the bottom rail shall have a fair chance to get on top. Every American boy knows this to be the fundamental principle of American society generally. From infancy he has heard how the trained brakeman became the railroad president; how the bank collector became the bank president; how the sweeper in the cotton mill became its president; how the poor farm boy worked his way through school and college and became President of the United States, or United States Senator, or Member of Congress, or governor; how the boy worked his way through college and became a college professor and finally president of the college. But he sees no such chance for his advancement in the Army. He finds what appears to be an impassable gulf, a deep chasm existing between enlisted men and commissioned officers. There may trickle to his ears a rumor that a few rare individuals have bridged that chasm and crossed that gulf, but he finds no encouragement, no word of hope from anyone in authority that he himself may ever cross that chasm.

My idea for suggesting this "school for soldiers" is to incorporate into the Army this essential principle of American life; to give every man a fair chance to rise to power; to make the Army reflect the undoubted truth that merit will win. The purpose of the school is to encourage ambitious and enterprising young men about 18, 19, or 20 years of age, having obtained a good high-school education, to enlist in the Army with the reasonable hope and fair prospect of making it a life business. Every man takes a pride in his life work; he will not desert it and will try to elevate his chosen life work.

We can not expect to have an Army with enlisted men of sufficient intelligence to become instructors and trainers for the civilian population under the present conditions of short enlistments with no adequate motive for reenlistment, and thus without any general sentiment among the enlisted men that the Army shall be a life business. But by this proposed school we declare to the best young men of the Nation that if they will come into the Army and conduct themselves well for two years and during their leisure moments continue to improve their minds by study, then they shall have a chance, through competitive examination, to go to this "school for soldiers," and if they have the ability and the character then they have an equal chance with the graduates of West Point to receive commissions in the United States Army. I know that the ratio of applications to appointments to West Point in my district are about 10 to 1. That means that for every young man who has a worthy desire and ambition to go to West Point gratified through a vacancy there are nine other young men disappointed. The other nine might, if given the opportunity, make just as good officers and some of them might make better officers than the fortunate tenth man chosen. My belief is that if there were this alternative door open to a career in the Army many of these disappointed young men would enlist in the Army and though they would be commissioned about two years later than their more fortunate friend who secured the appointment to West Point Military Academy, yet they would be assured of a chance.

The enlistment of thousands of this class of young men in the United States Army every year would enormously elevate the quality of the enlisted personnel of the Army. It certainly will be admitted that from among these thousands 200 very choice and promising young men will be found every year. The 200 thus selected will in my humble judgment prove to be better officer material than any equal 200 young men selected for West Point. Why do I dare advance this proposition? Because the young men selected for West Point are selected either by personal partiality, due to friendship between the Congressman and the family of the young man, or they are selected, as I do, by competitive examination. While the latter method is the better of the two, it must be admitted that even if it does select the young man best qualified mentally, it in no way involves considerations of character, initiative, self-reliance, and leadership, all so essential to successful officers.

But the method of selection proposed by me is far superior to that now prevailing in the selection of candidates for West Point. My proposition is to have thousands of young men under the constant daily observation of the company officers for a period of two years. These company officers at the end of two years will certify which of those in their opinion are best qualified from every point of view to finally become officers. These, then, will all go up into a nation-wide competitive examination. The competition will not merely involve book knowledge, but will involve a rating based upon physique, character, elements of leadership, and education. I would venture to compare the 200 young men thus selected by Army officers themselves with 200 men selected by Congressmen or by the Civil Service Commission under mental examination. My belief is that the 200 young men selected by Army officers from this high-class enlisted material will be obviously and conspicuously equal to the quality of those entering West Point, from the standpoint of military efficiency and officer material, and this consideration is the prime consideration from the point of view of national defense.

Now, what will be the effect of such "school for soldiers"? First of all, it will undoubtedly raise the standard and the quality of the young men applying for enlistment in the Army, on the average. It will give to these young men the prospect of promotion and inspire them with a desire to make the Army a life business. Thus it will almost totally wipe out the present disgraceful desertions. It will furnish a superior group of young men as candidates for commissions in the Army. Thus it will certainly elevate the qualities and efficiency of the officer personnel itself into which these classes of superior young officers will be constantly fed. Thus it will powerfully increase the efficiency of the Army and thus enormously add to the effectiveness of our national defense. National defense is the paramount consideration. Existing customs, institutions, and laws should be subordinated to national defense. Our Army, though good, is surely not perfect. I wish to improve our Army, to make it more efficient, to render it more capable of discharging its prime purpose of teaching and training civilians to fight the Nation's wars of defense.

So, the purpose of the school that I propose is to take men, grown men, knowing their own minds, who are already soldiers by choice, and give them a chance to be officers. On the contrary, the Military Academy takes boys, whose purposes are not yet fixed, who know nothing about the Army and its responsibilities, and undertakes to convert them into both soldiers and officers at the same time and by the same process.

I wish it distinctly understood that I have nothing in my mind and heart in reference to this matter other than the good of the Army, the good of the Nation, and adequate national defense. I have no son, and none of my nephews desires to be an Army officer. Many of my dearest friends are Army officers; some of them graduates of West Point Military Academy, and some of them are emergency officers.

I have purposely suggested that the school be established in the West, far removed from my own section, so as to eliminate any charge of selfish purpose. I believe this is a movement to which many of the best minds in the Army and out of it have been groping, and I believe that it will lead the way to the relief of the distressing conditions of desertions and low morale to which I have referred.

I will not press the bill for action at this session of Congress. I will undertake to lay it upon the minds and hearts of the Members and before the public, and then let it rest until next session. At that time, unless I am sooner convinced that I am on the wrong track, I will press it to hearing and to a vote in the committee. If it obtains a favorable report in the committee, I will press it for a vote in the House. At present I am firmly resolved to make it the major work of my legislative service. It seems that I could not render a better service to my country than to help in this way to rationalize and to stabilize our military service.

Since preparing the above remarks I have been furnished by The Adjutant General of the Army with a list of the names and addresses and previous service of the 40 persons mentioned in the letter of February 24, 1928, from The Adjutant General which is reproduced in full in these remarks. I find from a scrutiny of that list that the 40 men classified as enlisted men were technically and strictly enlisted, but as a matter of fact only 9 of them ever occupied the status of a private soldier, and the others were all flying cadets, who went directly from civil life into the special classification of "flying cadets," with the express purpose and intention, if they passed their training tests, to be commissioned, and if they failed to pass their tests to be discharged into civil life. These flying cadets really know nothing about the true and genuine status of an enlisted man. So the proportions are very different and far less favorable than indicated upon the surface. With only 9 out of 357 of the second lieutenants commissioned in the Army last year having ever had any genuine and substantial service as private soldiers, the case is more conspicuously strong that there is little, if any, hope that the ordinary private soldier may ever be commissioned. His chances, instead of being 1 out of 10, are in fact about 1 out of 40. If we apply the reasoning already made to that state of fact, we see what conclusion the ordinary business man would arrive at.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to prefer a unanimous consent request. The rule under which we are considering the naval construction bill provides for six hours of general debate. There seems to be a desire on the part of the Members for a little more time. I ask unanimous consent that general debate may be extended two hours, one-half to be given to those in opposition and one-half to those in favor of the construction bill as presented.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know who is going to control the two hours?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Oklahoma may have one hour and the gentleman from Pennsylvania one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate on the naval construction bill be extended two hours, one hour to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one hour by those opposed to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my thought is that these two additional hours ought to be divided the same as the original six hours were divided, one-half of the opposing time to be given on the other side.

Mr. SNELL. My request is exactly according to the rule.

Mr. BRITTEN. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Rules to suggest that one hour of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on this side.

Mr. SNELL. No; by those in favor and by those opposing.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did I not understand the gentleman to say that the time in opposition to the bill would be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma? I think that was said.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the rule and the gentleman's agreement the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] was to yield one-half of the time allotted to him to the gentleman from Georgia. I say that was under the rule and under the gentleman's agreement, and I am sure that gentleman's agreement will apply to the new time.

Mr. SNELL. That was my intention in making the request.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say this: I yielded to the wishes of both sides. Notwithstanding the fact that that was not my understanding of the original agreement, I gave in, and up to the present time I do not know who on that side is going to occupy the time in opposition.

Mr. SNELL. I will assure the gentleman from Oklahoma if he will tell me who should control that time on this side that such gentleman will have the time allotted to him.

Mr. BUTLER. And I assure the gentleman that time will be allotted in that way, because I come from Pennsylvania and we stand by bargains when they are made. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

THE PINK BOLLWORM OF COTTON

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House: Since I have been a Member of Congress for 15 years I have never felt my responsibility as such, except during the period of the war, as I feel that responsibility now; and feeling that responsibility so deeply, and not seeing my way clear to discharge it in the interest of our common country, I have obtained this allotment of time in order to present to my colleagues of the House the facts which have caused that burden to rest so heavily upon me, that I might have their assistance and their cooperation in the solution of the present problem and have them share that responsibility with me.

It is a peculiar situation and demands especial attention and, perhaps, the overriding of precedents heretofore set by the House.

The subject of my remarks is the Pectinophora gossypiella, a fearfully sounding name, but an insect more fearful in practice than the sound of its name. Just as concisely as possible I am going to give you a little history of the westward march of that insect, leaving enormous loss, woe, misery, and destruction in its wake.

Pectinophora gossypiella is the technical entomological name for what is commonly known as the pink bollworm of cotton. The first definite history of this insect, we find in India in 1842. From that time until 1907 or 1911 we hear but little of its progress or of its destruction except in India.

In 1911 it was discovered in Egypt, where general infestation has ensued. From Egypt it was transported in seed to South America, to the Hawaiian Islands, to Mexico, and it has recently been found, or rather newly infested areas have been found, in the State of Texas.

The countries where it has gained a firm foothold are as follows: East Africa, West Africa, Egypt, Nigeria, the Sudan, Zanzibar, India, Bengal, Syria, Burma, the Straits Settlements, China, the Philippines, Hawaii, Brazil, and Mexico. Throughout all the infestation in these various countries it has never been eradicated or even controlled in a single instance.

It was not until this most destructive of cotton pests invaded Texas and Louisiana in 1918 and 1919 that it found a "foeman worthy of its steel," when the energetic and scientific staff of the Department of Agriculture undertook its eradication, that it has ever been demonstrated that there is a successful way of completely eradicating the pest. It has been demonstrated beyond question that we have a remedy if we will apply it, and if it is not applied promptly and the insect is permitted to gain a firm foothold within the great Cotton Belt of our great country, then it is "good-bye" cotton culture in the United States, because the cotton farmers can not withstand the ravages of the two insects, the Mexican boll weevil and the pink bollworm.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Can the gentleman tell us the method of exterminating this bollworm?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but before I get to that, let me give the membership of the House a little idea of the damage it does. It will only take a moment.

First, let me show the membership of the House two bolls of cotton. The left-hand boll [indicating] is a normal boll normally opened. The right-hand boll is the same character of boll affected or attacked by the pink bollworm. It not only reduces the yield at least 33⅓ per cent but in addition thereto the cotton which escapes it and is gathered, is injured about 2 cents a pound and the contents of the seed for oil, and so forth, is damaged 20 per cent. So that this is one agricultural pest that not only reduces enormously the yield but destroys the quality of that which is produced.

Now, listen to this! Egypt is a cotton-producing country with climatic conditions similar in practically every respect to our own country. An investigator was sent to Egypt to investigate the extent of the damages of this pest, and he reported the damages by months. He reported that the damage to the bolls maturing in July was about 10 per cent; bolls maturing during August from 10 to 25 per cent; bolls maturing during September from 25 to 75 per cent; bolls maturing during October from 75 to 89 per cent.

Bear in mind that of the cotton crop of the United States at least 85 per cent of the bolls mature in August, September, and October, when from 25 to 89 per cent of the bolls are destroyed by this pest.

England has investigated every avenue to find a remedy by poisoning and there is no such remedy known. So far as our department is concerned they have been able to find no parasite that would destroy it or hold it in check.

In 1913 a complete survey was made of Brazil, hunting for it and exhausting every avenue of research to find it, but they could not find it. Again in 1916 they made a survey and found it throughout three States of Brazil. It has now infested six or seven States of Brazil, doing as much as 66⅔ per cent damage in one State and not less than 30 per cent damage to the cotton crop in the other States.

From Egypt again it went to Hawaii, and at the time it arrived there, which was in recent years, cotton production was a promising industry. When the pink bollworm appeared there it destroyed that industry and cotton is no longer cultivated there. So much for the damage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question purely for information?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I notice the gentleman employs the terms boll weevil and pink bollworm.

Mr. BUCHANAN. They are as different as day and night.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understand, but it is the worm and not the weevil that the gentleman is speaking of?

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is the worm, and for the information of my colleagues I will state that the pink boll weevil attacks the square, the bud, out of which comes the cotton bloom. It lays an egg in that square and the square dries up and drops off. The pink bollworm attacks the bolls that have escaped the weevil, and it has been said:

That the pink boll weevil destroys the square,
The pink bollworm destroys the boll,
And they both together will pull up the stalk and cover up the hole.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Did I understand the gentleman to say that they have found no remedy or way of exterminating the pink bollworm?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No poison; but an effective remedy through the establishment of noncotton zones.

It broke out here in 1918 and 1919, and there were about seven infestations in the United States, several in Texas, and one in Louisiana, and our department undertook its eradication. The States of Texas and Louisiana whole-heartedly cooperated, enacting drastic statutes to compel the establishment of cotton-free zones or noncotton zones; in other words, finding out the places of infestation and surveying them, including a safety area around them, and then declared by law that the owners of the land within the zone should not plant cotton, and prescribing punishment for so doing; in other words, prescribing condemnation proceedings in the establishment of cotton-free zones prohibiting the planting of cotton.

Then the Department of Agriculture went into this area, cleaned up all the stalks and trash, and even sprayed the ground with kerosene oil and burnt it over. No cotton was allowed to be planted in these areas. They kept it in this condition for two years and completely eradicated the pink bollworm, and our Government is the only Government out of 14 nations that has ever succeeded in a successful fight for the eradication of the pink boll-worm. It has not appeared in these areas since.

Last December seven counties in western Texas were found infested with this pest. These seven counties are on the western edge of the main cotton belt of Texas. Here they are on this map. The pink bollworm since 1918 has infested the cotton along the Rio Grande border on both sides of the Rio Grande, but between these infestations and the main cotton belt of Texas there is a 25 or 30 mile strip of semiarid land in which no cotton has been planted. It was thought that this territory between the border and the main cotton belt would prevent its spread to the main cotton-producing areas of Texas and the South. This was a mistaken idea, as the new infestation is 150 miles eastward and in the western boundary of the main cotton-producing area of my State, from which there is continuous, consecutive cotton production up the Atlantic seaboard, including the entire cotton area of our country with the exception of California and Oregon.

That is the situation, and unless prompt and drastic and effective action is taken to stamp out this new infested area it will only be a few years—it may be one, it may be two, may be a half dozen—until it will spread eastward and destroy the cotton-producing industry of our Nation.

Now, I come down to the problem in which I want you gentlemen to share the responsibility and aid me in finding a remedy. I have my own idea and have introduced a resolution, but whether or not it will pass the House depends on how you regard the problem and whether you believe it is for the welfare of our common country.

In the agricultural bill passed by the House this Congress just appropriated, all told, $687,000 to eradicate or pay the expenses of eradication of this pest in Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona. There is some infestation in the lower part of the States of New Mexico and Arizona that is not connected up with the main cotton-producing areas in that State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How many counties are infested?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There are 14 counties in Texas; 7 bordering on the Rio Grande are infested. The other 7 counties are in western Texas on the western edge of the real Cotton Belt.

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. EVANS of California. The gentleman says the pest has not gone further west than he pointed out on the map?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It has not gone further east. It is in New Mexico and Arizona and along the border.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Has the gentleman information as to when the pest made its first appearance in Europe and the United States?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. MOREHEAD. The reason I ask is that a great many of these pests have certain periods of time to run and then disappear. For instance, at a certain period we have in our section of the country chinch bugs, a very destructive pest to wheat, and we also have the Hessian fly. I have personally observed for 50 years that they come and after a period disappear. I was wondering if this pest would not have its time and then disappear.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The records show that this pest has been in India since 1842, leaving an annual toll of damage to the cotton products of that country. The records show that the pest broke out in Egypt in 1911, and that ever since then it has levied an increased toll annually on the cotton production of that country. In the history of no country where it has appeared has it been periodical, but has increased in number and gradually spread throughout the cotton-producing areas or such country with the regularity and certainty of the seasons.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I am very much interested, and I always am, for a remedy if we can get it, regardless of cost.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman, but I want to assure him that I am glad to have any Member ask any question, because I want to furnish the information. I am asking for assistance, cooperation, and advice, and in asking for that I must give all information requested of me.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. CARSS. The gentleman spoke of segregating certain districts from growing cotton in order to stamp out the pest. If you proceed to do that, is there any liability of the pest coming from other infested districts?

Mr. BUCHANAN. My proposition is to segregate all infested districts and stop planting cotton therein. My proposition is not only to stamp out the infested areas in the United States, but goes further and contemplates that our Government, through the State Department, shall take up the question with the Government of Mexico, and, through a mixed commission, a treaty or other cooperative agreement with Mexico, stamp out the pink bollworm and so save this the greatest of American agricultural industries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Some people have the idea that the pink bollworm and the pink boll weevil are the same.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; they are entirely distinct.

Mr. CARSS. Are the eggs of this pest laid by a fly?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is laid by the moth. It can fly a considerable distance, though it does not generally do it.

Mr. CARSS. If that is true, the eggs could be laid back in this district where the pest has been eradicated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the planting of cotton had been recommended, yes; but it is laid only on the cotton.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. KAHN). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I appreciate the courtesy very much, gentlemen of the House.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. Has the gentleman yet discussed the remedy?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; I have not come to that. I come now to the real problem that has caused me to shudder under the responsibility that I bear as a Member of this House, as a Representative from the greatest cotton-producing State of the Union. As I stated, in the agricultural appropriation bill we incorporated an appropriation of $687,000 for eradication purposes alone; that is, to pay the expenses of burning over the ground and eradicating the pest in cotton-free zones. At that time I expected the State of Texas through its State authority to establish these zones. A few days ago I received word—in fact, I have the report of the pink bollworm commission, organized under the law of Texas, on this desk—that they had not established cotton-free zones in this newly infested area, but had placed it under what is called regulated zones, which means nothing except to fumigate all of the cottonseed and the cotton going out of the district to any other place and regulate its destination. It leaves the infested area as a breeding ground, where millions of the eggs of these insects will be laid on the cotton bolls and the seed infected, which will enable them to multiply and increase tremendously. Here is the danger: This county in west Texas, this newly infested area, is a broad, level plain with no hills. For hundreds of miles you can scarcely see an undulation in the surface of the soil. A little wind from the west, or a little wind from the northwest, or a little wind from the southwest at the proper time while the moths are flying will carry those moths for hundreds of miles into the interior of Texas, Oklahoma, and perhaps Louisiana.

Mr. VESTAL. Madam Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the cottonseed will be infected, so that if the seed is taken somewhere else and planted it will also infect that area as well as the moths?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. The statement is better understood when I say that the egg is laid in the seed, and that egg or larva will live in that seed for two years. This longevity of life of the larva makes it one of the most dangerous pests that could possibly attack the cotton-producing areas of the world. It is spread by the moth, it is spread by the larva or egg in the seeds, it is spread by the cotton lint in the bale of cotton. One infestation in Texas came from the fact that Mexican cotton was shipped to Galveston, a storm came which washed the bales out and broke them open, and the larva escaped and infected the cotton in Louisiana and parts of Texas.

Let me now get to the solution. The pink bollworm commission adopted the regulated zones, which is nothing but a cradle to nurse the infant worms in, instead of a noncotton zone. I wired the governor and received replies from him as to the reason why that was done. I read the report of the pink bollworm commission, which gives the reason why that was done. Both state that the reason is that they had no State money, they had no Federal money with which to compensate the farmers for the condemned lands, and under the law of the land you can not condemn private property for a public purpose without compensation. Neither can you condemn private property without compensation being ready to pay whatever damage is caused by that public condemnation. Then I asked, Is there any reason why Texas can not appropriate the money? And the reply came that there is no money in the public revenues that could be appropriated; that the tax rate was fixed last July. The appropriations were made in pursuance of that tax levy to balance the revenues coming in. Therefore the money could not be provided by Texas, because the tax rate was fixed and the taxes were assessed and collected for this year, and if the legislature should meet they would have to raise the taxation rate and make it retroactive, which probably is unconstitutional after the citizen has paid his taxes for the year. That is the condition that confronts us. Texas is helpless to make any appropriation and the Federal Government has not made any appropriation, so that nothing but a regulated zone could follow, and that menaces the cotton culture of the United States. I am asking you to override the precedents heretofore established. The question is this: Is this great Government going to permit one of the greatest gifts that God ever bestowed upon our Nation, a monopoly in the cotton production, to be destroyed for the sake of four or five million dollars?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course not. We can not let this go.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I introduced a resolution authorizing an appropriation of $5,000,000 to compensate the farmers for their damages sustained by reason of the establishment of cotton-free zones. That resolution is now in the Agricultural Committee and has been referred to the Secretary of Agriculture.

I do not think I am abusing any confidence when I say to you that the Department of Agriculture thinks that is the only remedy for the situation.

Mr. CARSS. Madam Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Is not this a matter of greater damage to agriculture than the corn borer?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We have not sufficient facts to determine the extent of damage that may be inflicted by corn borer to draw a comparison.

Mr. CARSS. We appropriated $10,000,000 for the corn borer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, no. We appropriated $10,000,000 to investigate and see if we could find a remedy to eradicate the corn borer. In this pink bollworm case we have found the remedy, and all that we need is to find the money with which to eradicate the pest.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope my friend does not for a moment believe that the people of America propose to have this industry wiped out. In my judgment Congress will be glad to make this appropriation. We can not go unclothed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I appreciate the statement of my good friend. I expected a statement like that coming from him. He looks to the interests of our common country, and it matters not to him what section is to be benefited. He realizes that the progress and greatness of one section adds to the progress and greatness and grandeur of our common country. [Applause.] I wish every Member of Congress, east and west and north and south, would rise to that status of American manhood and womanhood. [Applause.]

Now, in northern Mexico there are only three primary infestations. The area is comparatively small, and I believe that the administration when it takes up the matter through the State Department with a similar department of the Mexican Government we can enter into a treaty that will result in the eradication of the pink bollworm in northern Mexico and the United States, and that achievement will be a blessing to unborn generations. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Madam Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Can the gentleman give us any information as to when the Committee on Agriculture will favor us with a hearing on this resolution? We are anxious to assist you in securing a favorable report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No. It was referred to the committee when introduced, and yesterday it was referred by the committee to the Department of Agriculture for a report. That will be referred first by the Department of Agriculture to the Bureau of the Budget, and then the Bureau of the Budget will refer it back to the department, and the department will report to the Committee on Agriculture.

I have no means, of course, of knowing the disposition of the Bureau of the Budget, but I believe it is sufficiently broad-minded and the President has the interests of the Nation sufficiently at heart to report favorably on the resolution.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I know the Bureau of the Budget did report favorably upon the corn-borer proposition. I assume that it will report favorably on this resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; and we carried about $3,000,000 in the agricultural appropriation bill for the corn borer this session. I do not regret it. Since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations and on the subcommittee on the agricultural bill I have not voted against any amount of appropriations having in view such a purpose. Long ago, when Sidney Anderson was the chairman of that subcommittee, I advocated an increase of the appropriation to stamp out the spring rust of wheat by digging up and destroying the barberry bushes. When the corn-borer proposition came up I advocated an appropriation to find the remedy. When you find the remedy the Government should appropriate all necessary funds for eradication, stamp out the pest, and stop the appropriation no longer necessary. If we permit such pest to spread beyond the possibility of eradication, then we annually, year after year and forever, make large appropriations to retard its spread, control its movements through quarantine, and lessen the damage.

Mr. HARE. Madam Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. HARE. Have you any idea as to the number of acres in the infested area?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There are 360,000 acres in this new infested area.

Mr. HARE. Will the appropriations cover anything outside of this infested area?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. All infestations in Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico.

Mr. CLARKE. Madam Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the gentleman state the amount carried in his resolution?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Six hundred and eighty-seven thousand dollars to pay the expenses of eradication alone carried in the agricultural appropriation bill heretofore passed, and this $5,000,000 that I am pleading for is to pay the farmers for the condemnation of their right to plant cotton.

Mr. ROMJUE. Madam Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. I was wondering if the gentleman had conferred with the Department of Agriculture about this matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have conferred with the department dozens of times.

Mr. ROMJUE. What is the attitude of the department?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Their attitude is that a $5,000,000 appropriation is the only remedy to meet the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Budget Bureau was as well informed as the membership of the House concerning the thoroughness with which the gentleman from Texas undertakes any project that he starts about, there would not be any doubt about what would be the report of the Bureau of the Budget on this project.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; there should not be any doubt.

Now, gentlemen, let me make one statement to you as to what I think the policy of Congress should be on all questions like this. I care not whether it is the spring rust of wheat, the Japanese beetle, the gypsy moth, the pine beetle, the Mexican bean beetle, the foot-and-mouth disease, the Mexican fruit fly, or any other insect or contagious disease that threatens the agricultural interests of our country. When such an insect or disease threatens that industry, I say to you Congress ought not to lay down any hard and fast rule as to how much the State shall contribute and how much the Federal Government shall contribute. Each case should be diagnosed separately, and our course should be guided by that specific diagnosis. For instance, in Nevada the foot-and-mouth disease might break out. It is the most contagious disease known to the livestock industry. Suppose there should be a general outbreak in Nevada and all the stock interests were threatened, should that little State of Nevada pay half the value of the killed and destroyed cattle and bankrupt itself for the benefit of the balance of the Nation? It is a national problem with which the National Government should deal. If they can get assistance from the State, get it; but if they can not get it, stamp it out, anyway, because that is our duty to our country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Gentlemen, in conclusion, I think that when God Almighty created this world and when He created the United States He was in a good humor and smiled. He gave us a salubrious climate; He gave us fertile soil; He implanted within the bowels of the earth every mineral that is useful to mankind; He abundantly fructified it with teeming water, so that the sun, in its majestic course, does not look down upon a fairer land or one more capable of administering to wants and gratifying the luxuries of man. When He created it He gave us cotton. He gave us a climate and a soil which gave us a monopoly in the production of cotton, that fair, white staple intended by God Almighty to clothe a naked world. Ah, it is fairer, better, and more serviceable than the fleece which Jason sought. Now, after being blessed with this great gift, are we going to sit by and permit an insignificant bug from India to rob us of God's priceless gift? I thank you. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. KAHN). Under the special order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Madam Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the six counties mentioned by my colleague [Mr. BUCHANAN], where the pink bollworm is said to have been found, happen to be in the district I attempt to represent here, the sixteenth district. This map shows my district marked in red. It has an area of just one-fourth of the area of the great State of Texas. I live in El Paso, where it is said the "sunshine spends the winter," and some wag has been unkind enough to say, "where the moonshine spends the summer and winter, and winter is there all the time." [Laughter.] But we are sober and well-ordered, law-abiding, and good moral people over there, gentlemen of the House. Of course, we do not want to have any menace in my section that would menace the entire cotton-growing section of the South. And if we have such menace we will do our best to eradicate same—but our farmers have to live just like yours, by producing what is most profitable to them.

Now, from where I live to Andrews County, in my district, is about 350 miles. I know these people. I have had occasion to know them for a long time—as I feel honored to represent them in this Congress—also the splendid people of the other five counties mentioned.

The proposition is this, gentlemen: In these six counties, where they claim the pink bollworm has been found in recent months, there are people who come from every section of the United States. There is only one county where in recent months they claim the pink bollworm has been found that is not in my district and that is in Dawson County, in the district so ably represented by my friend, Mr. JONES. [Applause.]

Now, along the Rio Grande, in my district, in Brewster County, they claim the pink bollworm is right there [indicating on map]. They have also found it over in Presidio County, near Presidio, so the State commissioner states. From Brewster County it is a distance of about 250 miles to Andrews County, Midland County, Glasscock County, and Ector County; and about 300 miles to Dawson County.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. In just a second, I will be pleased to yield to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. Marlatt, the chairman of the Federal Horticultural Board of the Department of Agriculture, tells me that in all probability, on account of the fact that we have some pretty strong winds that blow from the south during the spring and the summer and early fall, it is probable that this moth, as described by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], has blown from down on the Rio Grande in Brewster and Presidio [indicating on map] across the plains to the counties indicated by Mr. BUCHANAN. If this is true—and Mr. Marlatt says it is probable; I do not know, I confess—then it could, of course, blow east from the west winds into the districts of other gentlemen from Texas and into the great States of Arkansas and Louisiana.

If these gentlemen are correct—and they are the men who have made these examinations and investigations—why, of course, it is a serious menace, and it is a menace that should be controlled; and my farmers want it controlled and eradicated. However, Mr. Marlatt, who has been out there, states to me that with many, many experts going through hundreds of fields, as yet no live bollworm has been found.

Gentlemen of the House, I have always been a State rights man, and I am a State rights man to-day. I have never felt the Federal Government should dictate to my State as to what our people should do when they have laws governing matters as they have in the pink bollworm in Texas.

I want to yield now to my friend the gentleman from Kansas before proceeding further.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman has already answered the question I was going to ask.

Mr. HERSEY. What has the boll weevil to do with State rights? The boll weevil does not recognize them.

Mr. HUDSPETH. This, my friend, is the pink bollworm, which is said to be more destructive than the boll weevil.

Mr. HERSEY. What is the gentleman's remedy?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not know except what has been said by experts, both from the State and Federal Governments. Some say that the pink bollworm commission should create a regulated zone—that is, the State commission—I will say to my friend, while others say they should create a noncotton zone.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. CARSS. According to the testimony of experts, it is now impossible to do anything with the boll weevil——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman mean the boll weevil or the bollworm?

Mr. CARSS. I mean the boll weevil. If the boll weevil, however, had been taken in time, they claim it could have been successfully combated, but that time has now gone by. I want to know if we are attacking this problem soon enough, so that we can stamp out the bollworm before it becomes too late to eliminate it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I certainly trust we are attacking it in time, I will say to my friend, because it is a very serious menace to the cotton industry no doubt. We should, of course, attack it at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. CARSS. The point I am making is that we should have attacked the boll weevil in time; but, of course, that is water that has now gone under the bridge; but we want to attack this pest before it becomes firmly established in this country.

Mr. HUDSPETH. This situation has been described by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. Anything that affects one part of this great Republic, of course, indirectly affects it all.

We are a united country now and have been for over 60 years, and will always be until the end of time. Anything that affects any part of the country affects me and my people in Texas. The corn borer in Iowa, my friend COLE's State, seriously affected me and my people in Texas. Why? Because we want your corn to feed our cattle down there, to fatten them and our sheep and hogs. The Japanese beetle up in Maine, the State of my friends HERSEY and BEEDY, affected us because we buy your Irish potatoes; and anything that affects you and your farming industry or affects you industrially affects the great State that I come from and the district I come from.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Certainly.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is not this really an international question?

Mr. HUDSPETH. The fact that it is said to have come from Mexico into Texas would probably make it so. If the Federal Government is instrumental in causing our State commission to create a noncotton zone, then the Federal Government should pay all at once.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Because you have to fight this pest in Mexico or you will not be able to get anywhere.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That is true, Mr. COLE. We have a proposition of that sort made by the pink bollworm commission to our governor to create a commission jointly with Mexico. We have a courageous governor down there now and an honest one. He is a young man, but he is a courageous and honest gentleman beyond any question. [Applause.] I did not vote for him in the first primary; I voted for Governor Davidson; but in the second primary I did vote for him and made speeches for him.

Now, this is what Governor Moody proposes.

Mr. VESTAL. If he is as good a man as you are, CLAUDE, we are for him.

Mr. HUDSPETH. He is a better one and a very courageous young man. Here is what he says. He proposes that a high commission of the two countries, Mexico and the United States, be appointed—because we get this pink bollworm from Mexico, so all State and Federal authorities claim—and then he suggests that we ask our neighbor Republic to the south to appropriate money to eradicate it in that country. It is from that country, beyond any question, that it has come into the State of Texas and, I take it also, into the great States of New Mexico and Arizona. Mr. Moody says that we should appoint a joint commission. He calls it a high joint commission, with commissioners from the United States, and then he suggests that the President of Mexico or the Governors of the States of Coahuila and Chihuahua—I believe they are the two States just south of the border there—appoint commissioners to meet with our commissioners, and if Mexico will eradicate the pink bollworm there we will eradicate it in the United States and in my district and State, but it should be done without loss to the farmer. That is the situation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the gentleman think we would be amply justified in furnishing some of the money and also experts to assist in eradicating this pest in Mexico?

Mr. HUDSPETH. It would be the part of economy and good business judgment beyond any question, I will state to the gentleman, because we all know that when we deal with Mexico they sometimes deal in the manana, which is to-morrow, and they probably have not sufficient money to commence the fight on the pink bollworm. I do not know but the fight should be commenced in Mexico to stamp it out at once.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE. Have you had any assurances of cooperation?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not know that it has been taken up with them yet, I will state to my friend. It was just proposed in the last week or so, as I saw by the press, by the governor of our State and the State commission. Probably some department of our Government has taken it up with Mexico.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will state that the Department of Agriculture has had it up with the governors of those States and with Mexico, and the most friendly spirit has been demonstrated by them toward complete eradication.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am glad to hear that statement, because there is the crux of the whole matter. When we get Mexico interested and eradicate the bollworm there we will keep it out of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I ask unanimous consent, Madam Speaker, to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will.

Mr. HERSEY. I am interested to know about the remedy. I hope we are not drifting into the Senate idea for a remedy of all evils in this country—an investigation. Is that what the gentleman is after?

Mr. HUDSPETH. The resolution proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] appropriates $5,000,000 to pay losses of the farmers if noncotton zones are created by the pink bollworm commission of Texas. I do not know how we should proceed. I do know that the people of this section—namely, the six counties on the Texas Pacific and two counties on the Rio Grande—are small farmers; a great many, if not all of them, poor men, comparatively, from the States of Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee, and many other States, who all came in here to buy these cheap lands where they can raise a bale of cotton an acre in some years, but not every year. They are poor people. They come, as I say, from every part of the United States.

I know them; they are all law-abiding people. Of course, if they are convinced—and they had a meeting at Sweet Water or Big Springs—3,000 farmers attended—I understand they are as good citizens as we have in the United States—and, if they are convinced that this is the thing to do, they will assent, but they have bought up 40 or 60 acres in many instances and if a noncotton zone is created you will have to provide for these poor people so that they can subsist and pay them their losses now; I mean the loss they will sustain by being prohibited from planting cotton if their State should prohibit them from so doing at a suggestion from the Federal Government.

As stated by my colleague [Mr. BUCHANAN] the Legislature of Texas will not convene in regular session until next January. They have no money in my State now, he says. What I want to impress on you gentlemen is that if you do pass this resolution and appropriate this money for the eradication of the pink bollworm that these people should be paid all loss sustained and the money made available before the zone is created and losses fixed if same can be done. In other words, they should be paid the difference between the value of what they are permitted to plant and what they could secure if they planted a full crop of cotton. And these six counties are largely cotton-growing counties, and the two on the Rio Grande—viz, Brewster and Presidio—are largely so where farming can be done with any profit at all.

Most of these counties have given up stock raising for raising cotton largely. Why? Because it was not profitable to raise cattle on land worth $15 or $20 per acre and even more value. In other words, they could produce more cotton than they could get out of livestock, value for value.

Now, as I say, these people are law-abiding. Some people said that they would resist the law by armed force, but they will not do that. They are good, average, law-abiding citizens. They may not obey the Biblical injunction to turn the other cheek when they know their rights are in this way trampled upon, but they will resist with legal means only; but if they believe that their Government and their State are standing behind them as they should they will obey the law.

Now, this is a very important matter; there is no question about it. It is certainly important to the splendid patriotic farmers and good Americans in my district and it is important to this Congress. I want to cooperate with you and help protect your farmers, but still I insist on you gentlemen helping me protect mine.

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman's purpose is eradication and not investigation?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes. I will say to my friend from Indiana I certainly want this pest eradicated. But if they create a noncotton zone, you will have to make provision for taking care of the farmers out there by paying losses at once—these good people who will suffer by not being able to plant cotton. And, in fact, many of them have already planted cotton in these said to be infested counties; it is their best paying crop. [Applause.]

I shall notify them of this resolution. It is now before the Agricultural Committee. I know the farmers in my district will cooperate in every way to eradicate this menace; but remember, gentlemen, they have rights that I will do my best to preserve, and this House, I believe, will aid me. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. KAHN). The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Madam Speaker and gentlemen of the House, just one additional thought which I want to emphasize. I am very glad indeed that it has been made clear to the House in the course of the discussion that if the pink bollworm is to be eradicated some agreement or arrangement must be made between this country and Mexico. In connection with that proposition I desire to make this suggestion: In the first place, when the States came into the Union, they not only surrendered essential elements of sovereignty, but by reason of the fact that they did surrender, what is ordinarily known among nations as border police, custom guards, and so forth, are not maintained by the States. For instance, if Texas were an independent nation, Texas would have at the various ports of entry its own police, its own guard, who could turn back foreign peoples and their products. That is one proposition. The other proposition is that the Constitution prohibits the State of Texas from entering into a treaty with Mexico for the eradication of this thing which is a menace at its door, and as has been well stated by other gentlemen, a menace to the whole country.

As a matter of fact, the boll weevil has been to the advantage of the South, strange as it may seem. It reduced production in the South to a point where you people who purchase cotton pay a higher total price for the South's production than otherwise. The boll weevil is to the detriment of the buyer of the cotton and not to the detriment of the producer of cotton under the uneconomic methods and conditions under which cotton is sold. This pink bollworm may turn out to be the same thing. Texas can not enter into an agreement with Mexico, and, therefore, the obligation rests directly upon the Federal Government to do three things—one to guard this border line, two to stamp out this enemy which has gotten by the Federal Government border protection, and the other to extend across quickly into Mexico, under treaty, and, if possible, eradicate this thing at its source in so far as we are concerned, which is starting well on its march across the continent. The experts say that in their judgment it will be a greater menace than the cotton boll weevil.

I thank you gentlemen very much for having permitted me to speak out of order. I apologize to the majority leader who did me the personal compliment to withhold his objection to the granting of my request.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. BUTLER. Madam Speaker, I acknowledge the very great pleasure it gives me to address our esteemed Congresswoman now occupying the chair. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11526, to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval construction bill, with Mr. BACON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER], who helped to make this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the Navy Department with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget submitted a building program to consist of 25 light cruisers, 32 submarines, 5 airplane carriers, and 9 torpedo leaders, costing in round numbers $740,000,000. This program is needed by the Navy, but after long and careful consideration the Committee on Naval Affairs came to the unanimous conclusion that the country could not embark upon this full program at this time. The financial condition of the country could not withstand it without a severe strain. The demands upon the Government Treasury are so extraordinarily heavy at this session that the committee wisely reduced the program to 15 cruisers and 1 airplane carrier. These, to cost in round numbers $274,000,000, are all to be laid down during the fiscal years 1929–30 and 1931, or, in other words, five each year and all to be completed in six years. The airplane carrier is to be laid down during the fiscal year 1930.

SIZE, PURPOSE, AND COST

These 15 vessels are of the type called "light cruisers," of 10,000 tons displacement each, of high speed and enormous steaming radius. They will have no armor. The purpose which these vessels will serve is twofold:

First. For scouting and screening duties with the battleship fleets; to locate the whereabouts and movements of the enemy fleet, to the end that contact with the enemy may be had under the most advantageous circumstances.

Second. To disperse cruiser raids of the enemy; to protect our ports; guard the approaches to the Panama Canal, the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, and other important points; to protect merchant vessels by keeping the trade routes open; to convoy and transport men and munitions; and generally to keep the sea open and controlled.

The main battery of each of these vessels will be eight 8-inch guns, with secondary and special batteries of the latest and most effective types. The speed under forced draft will be somewhere between 33 and 36 knots, while the steaming radius will vary under different speeds and sea conditions, but will be sufficient to cross either or any ocean and return probably without refueling. Each vessel will have a complement of airplanes and air equipment. The cost is estimated at $17,000,000 each, with all arms, munitions, and stores aboard ready for sea. These vessels will be as formidable as any of their class in the world, and probably more formidable from the fact of their excessively high speed. The airplane carrier will be of about 13,800 tons normal displacement, capable of carrying 72 planes. The speed of this vessel will probably be between 29 and 32 knots, with cost estimated at $19,000,000.

THE CRUISER SITUATION

This country now has 10 light cruisers of the first line, each 7,500 tons normal displacement, with speed from 33.7 to 38.48 knots per hour. Each has a main battery of twelve 6-inch, 53-caliber guns, with secondary batteries of antiaircraft and deck protection. These vessels were all launched since May, 1921, and all have been in commission since February, 1924. They are all good vessels. Their names are the Cincinnati, Concord, Detroit, Marblehead, Memphis, Milwaukee, Omaha, Raleigh, Richmond, and Trenton.

Then we have 11 vessels termed light cruisers of the second line—the Albany, Birmingham, Chattanooga, Chester, Cleveland, Denver, Des Moines, Galveston, New Orleans, Olympia, and Salem. These vessels vary from 3,200 to 5,500 tons normal displacement, and in speed from 16.41 to 26 knots per hour, with batteries of from four to ten 5-inch guns. All these vessels are old, launched between November, 1892, and July, 1907, and some of them in commission since 1895. The latest is the Salem, going into commission in July, 1908. All of these vessels except the Cleveland, Denver, and Galveston are now out of commission, obsolete, and of no military value. It is difficult to justify their continuation on the Navy's list of active ships.

The strangest fiction of all our so-called cruisers is that class known upon the Navy Department's records as "second-line cruisers." There are 11 of these, all old-time battleships, and are as follows: The Charlotte, formerly the North Carolina; Frederick, formerly the Maryland; Huntington, formerly the West Virginia; Huron, formerly the South Dakota; Missoula, formerly the Montana; Pittsburgh, formerly the Pennsylvania; Pueblo, formerly the Colorado; Rochester, formerly the Saratoga, but originally the New York; and Seattle, formerly the Washington. All these vessels are old, all launched between 1901 and 1906, and all in commission for over 20 years. All are now out of commission, old, obsolete, and of no military value. The speed of these ships, even if it were possible to put them in a seaworthy condition, is about 22 knots and their normal displacements from 10,000 to 15,000 tons. The only purpose in the world, if such can be called a purpose, is to pad up our list of ships—paper ships.

We are now building eight 10,000-ton cruisers; 2 at the Brown-Boverie Electric Co., at Camden, N. J.; 2 at the Newport News Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Co., at Newport News, Va.; 1 at the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co., at Quincy, Mass.; 1 at each of the United States navy yards at New York, Mare Island, and Puget Sound. Two of these vessels are well under way, and the entire eight will be in commission within three years. These will be splendid ships, speedy with great steaming radius, 8-inch guns, and airplane complements. It is this class of vessels that the present program of 15 will increase.

To sum up our program we have but 10 light cruisers now in commission; that is, all except three at the greatest of our second-line light cruisers, all others are obsolete, out of condition, and possess no naval value. It is really a shame that we have permitted this indispensable class of vessels to fall so low. This program will in some degree rehabilitate it. Should this present program of 15 be adopted we will have in 1935, with its completion and the completion of the 8 authorized in 1924, 23 light cruisers, each of 10,000 tons, and in addition thereto the 10 light cruisers of the 7,500 class, or 33 in all.

ALL NAVIES ARE RELATIVE IN STRENGTH

The Washington Conference on Naval Armaments of 1921–22 related only to capital ships and airplane carriers. Vessels of 10,000 tons and below carrying armaments of 8-inch guns and under are not included within its terms. Any nation can build as many as it desires. The ratio of 5–5–3 was agreed upon, so far as capital ships between, respectively, United States, Great Britain, and Japan, but unrestricted construction of the light-cruiser type was permitted and open to all nations. Immediately after the Washington conference Great Britain inaugurated a heavy construction program of this type of vessel. Great Britain will, in 1935, have 63 of this type as against our 33; and Japan will have 33 as against our 33. So it is easy to see we have not sustained anywhere near the 5–5–3 ratio on this class of vessels. There is no element of competition or competitive construction in this program. It is simply designed to meet to a reasonable degree our national requirements. The adoption of the 5–5–3 ratio of itself inherently established the relative strength of the three principal naval powers and therefore all construction is, to a certain degree, in comparison with that of other powers. It is so in the very nature of things.

REPLACEMENT PROGRAM

This program is purely a replacement. New vessels are to be constructed to take the place of those old and worthless. There is no thought of our country attempting to outstrip others and thereby to launch a world-wide competition. We are simply replacing our discarded vessels with modern construction and thereby attempting in a modest, economical way to meet the Nation's requirements.

Of course, the ever-present pacificist and those of the pacificist turn of mind have heralded this as a preparation program for war! These idealists by some distortion of reasoning appear to think that by rendering ourselves helpless war will be averted. There can be no greater fallacy than by following such a line of thought. To those of us upon whom the duty rests to provide for the national defense, we must perform that duty irrespective of the exaggerated and sometimes positively untruthful statements of those who would have no Army and no Navy, nor other means of protecting our people and preserving our national self-respect. We are simply doing what a sensible people ought to do for their own protection. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, with great pleasure I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE]. Mr. HALE contributed very largely to the preparation of this bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, if the time allotted to me were so limited that I would be permitted to speak but a single sentence, in that sentence I could not fail to acknowledge the pleasure and inspiration which has been afforded me in the opportunity to work this year with and under the leadership of the well and worthily beloved gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]. [Applause.]

Our problems with regard to naval construction fall generally into two classifications:

The first classification is that of capital ships or battleships, which, notwithstanding the position taken by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC], are well designated by the best military advice in this country as the backbone of the naval fleet. With those, however, we have no immediate concern, because, under the terms of the Washington treaty, replacements are not permitted until 1931. The second classification is that of auxiliary ships, which afford protection for and extension of the operations of the capital ships. The most important auxiliaries are cruisers, destroyers, submarines, aircraft carriers, and converted merchant ships. With these latter also, the merchant ships, we have no immediate concern here, but later in this session I trust the importance of the problem of convertible merchant ships will be impressed with great force upon the membership of this Congress.

It may be profitable, in order to solve our problem to the best advantage, for us to review briefly the situation which has existed with regard to naval establishments during the last decade. At the close of the World War we had a program which we were in the process of constructing which would have given us, beyond dispute, the superiority of the seas over that of any other nation. But we called the Washington conference, made our sacrifice, and relinquished our opportunity for superiority, which we did not desire then, and which we do not desire now. It was established at that conference by agreement that the naval power of Great Britain should be equal to ours, that the naval power of Japan should be in the ratio of 3 to 5 with ours, and that the naval power of France and Italy should be in the ratio of 1.67 to 5 with ours.

At the Washington conference we made an effort to reach an agreement not only on capital ships, which was reached, but also an agreement on auxiliary ships, which would have been reached in all human probability had it not been for the fact that France and the smaller nations would not agree to the abolition or limitation of the submarine. Inasmuch as the submarine is the enemy of the destroyer, the cruiser, the battleship, and the merchant ship, and inasmuch as the destroyer is the enemy of the submarine, the cruiser the enemy of the destroyer and of the enemy cruisers, and also the aid and protection of the battleship, the conference failed to reach an agreement on auxiliary vessels. But we hoped that an agreement might be brought about. So we delayed the construction of our auxiliary vessels while the other nations went forward with that construction, and we called the Geneva conference to complete the work which we had undertaken at Washington. The Geneva conference failed. There, at first, the ratios established at the Washington conference were accepted in principle by the other nations for auxiliary ships, but when it came to writing an agreement, the ratios established at Washington were denied in fact for cruisers by Great Britain.

It should not be necessary to argue our right to equality with Great Britain or our right to the ratio of 5 to 3 with Japan and 5 to 1.67 with Italy and France. But if it is necessary, although those ratios were accepted by those powers at Washington, and in principle at Geneva, we need only examine the facts to reach the conclusion that they are justified. Here in America we have a population of 120,000,000 people; a vast territory; resources the extent of which is yet unknown; a water-borne commerce equal to that of any other nation in the world; imports which must be carried overseas which are vitally necessary to our welfare in time of peace or in time of war, such as manganese and at least eight other metals, camphor, iodine, and other important medicines, jute, silk, wool, and other textiles, hides and rubber, coffee and sugar, nitrates and mica; we have possessions in both great oceans, the protection of the Panama Canal, and a self-assumed obligation under the Monroe doctrine to maintain peace on the Western Continent. I wish I might have the time—which I have not—to read to you the statement of Admiral Hilary Jones, American delegate at Geneva, who with tact, poise, knowledge, and soundness of judgment, without a trace of militarism, proved himself to me—one who has frequented courts and hearings for 20 years or more—to be, without exception, the finest and most helpful witness I have ever seen. [Applause.] He gave us in the hearings a justification for our adherence to the right of parity with any other power, whether we choose to exercise the right or not, which to me is unanswerable. I commend to you the statement of Admiral Hilary Jones on page 1198 of the hearings.

There has been talk, too much of it, of conflict between Great Britain and the United States. We, representatives of the American people, know that America nourishes no desire for and harbors no thought of such an emergency. But both of these great nations must consider, in preparing for national defense, (1) the possibility of conflict with combinations of other powers; (2) the preservation of their rights as neutral nations in the midst of conflicts in which neither of them is a belligerent. We have only to revert to 1914 to know that out of an almost cloudless sky the devastating storm of war may break. We insist that we have a right as a neutral nation to continue our trade upon the seas in time of war, not only with other neutral nations but with any and all of the belligerent nations. Experience has demonstrated that all belligerents—nations fighting for existence—have no respect for the rights of neutrals unless such rights are maintained by a force sufficient to command respect. Hence it is because of these two possible contingencies, and not because of any prospect of conflict with Great Britain, and because, too, of the fact that a navy can not be built in a day nor in a month nor in a year, but in not less than from three to five years, and because of the facts heretofore related involving our interests for which protection is necessary, that our indisputable right to a navy equal to that of any other power in the world can not be denied.

We have a constitutional duty to maintain a navy. That is our responsibility and ours alone. But we have, too, a constitutional duty to represent the American people. In the solution of this problem, we need to direct our attention to that phase of our constitutional obligation, because, by design, the Constitution of the United States provides that the civil authority shall be supreme over the military authority. There is no better exemplification of that proposition than the fact that it is the Congress of the people which has the right to declare war, and not the War Department. And it is our duty under the Constitution, too, having determined the military view of our necessity, to determine the civil viewpoint, and if there is any conflict between the two, to adjust and reconcile them as best we may and harmonize the one with the other.

The new bill which we offer represents our effort to harmonize the military viewpoint with the civil viewpoint. The original program which was presented to us closely approached parity with Great Britain. It did not quite reach parity so far as combatant ships alone are concerned, and we must remember that if we possessed battleship for battleship, cruiser for cruiser, destroyer for destroyer, aircraft carrier for aircraft carrier, and submarine for submarine with Great Britain, even then we would be in no wise on a parity with her because of the great outstanding fact that she possesses a convertible merchant marine power in the ratio of four or five to one with that of the United States of America.

Discussing the bill as we have presented it, let me say briefly just wherein it differs from the original program. The original bill provided for 25 cruisers; the new bill provides for 15; the original bill provided for 9 destroyer leaders; the new bill provides for none; the original bill provided for 5 aircraft carriers; the new bill provides for 1; the original bill provided for 32 submarines; the new bill provides for none; the original bill involved an expenditure of $740,000,000; the new bill involves an expenditure of $274,000,000; the original bill provided no definite time in which the ships provided for should be laid down; the new bill provides that 5 cruisers shall be laid down in 1929, 5 in 1930, and 5 in 1931. The new bill, in addition provides for the construction of 2 salvage ships. The original bill provided that the President should have authority to suspend the construction authorized if an international conference for the limitation of armament should be called. The new bill provides that such authority shall exist only if such a conference is called and acts by agreement for further limitation of naval armament, and that the United States must be a party to and bound by such agreement before suspension of construction can be had.

We have attempted, in the performance of our duty, to determine what the informed American public opinion is in order to reconcile it with the military demand. We have concluded that the American people under no circumstances desire to abandon their legal and moral right to equality in naval power with any other nation in the world, but that whether we choose to exercise the right or not is a matter of our own concern. We have felt—and I think I speak the sense of the Naval Affairs Committee—that, so far as the exercise of our right to-day is concerned, the American people see no real pressing necessity for us to achieve exact mathematical parity with Great Britain or parity on the ratio of 5 to 3 with Japan or on the ratio of 5 to 1⅔ with Italy and France. They do desire: First, a reasonable degree of security; second, that security be achieved without extravagance and with reasonable economy; third, that our naval construction avoid, so far as possible, the element of competition with other powers in naval armament; and, fourth, that if it may become possible a further limitation of naval armament may be effected. Without abandoning our right to the ratio parity established by the Washington conference, should we desire to exercise it, we believe that this bill reconciles the military need, which was admirably presented to us by the Navy Department, with the desire of the informed civil authority. I may add that, from the military point of view, and from the viewpoint of the right to parity, the original program presented to us was thoroughly justified.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I feel we ought to yield five minutes more to this gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. HALE. I thank the gentleman.

The reasons for the modification of the original program with regard to destroyers, submarines, and aircraft carriers have been set forth adequately by the speakers who have preceded me. The important problem we have to consider is that of cruisers. We believe that this bill does provide (1) security in that it gives us 15 modern cruisers to replace 22 obsolete cruisers; that it gives us 150,000 tons of modern cruisers to replace 179,000 tons of obsolete cruisers; that it gives the type of cruisers we need. We lack naval bases, and by the Washington treaty we agreed neither to multiply nor to strengthen those we have in the Pacific west of Hawaii. Great Britain possesses naval bases to the extent of 30 or more, scattered all over the world, and which result in her need, not for large cruisers, but for a great number of small cruisers, which can receive their replenishing supply of fuel and material from point to point as they sail the seas. We must build the largest cruisers that the Washington treaty permits, 10,000 tons, because they must carry with them the supplies and fuel necessary to traverse the great distances which exist between our few and widely separated bases of supply. The cruisers we build must carry 8-inch guns, the largest permitted under the Washington treaty, because that is the type of armament best suited to the size of the cruisers we build, and because, too, the cruisers which other nations have built of the size we propose to build carry that same armament. (2) It gives us economy, because it reduces the program from $740,000,000 to $274,000,000. If we were to replace our whole Navy over a period of 20 years, assuming that to be the average life of a ship, it would cost us in the total $1,250,000,000 and more. One-twentieth of that value replaced each year would mean at least $60,000,000 a year. This program calls for $45,000,000 a year for six years. By provision for a definite time of construction, instead of an indefinite time, as provided in the original bill, we will be enabled to save $15,000,000, based upon the testimony of prospective bidders for this construction. (3) It avoids competition because it gives to America, with what we have built and building, 33 modern cruisers, while Japan will possess an equal number and Great Britain twice as many. It will leave us with a cruiser tonnage of 100,000 tons less than parity with Great Britain and 50,000 tons less than the established ratio with Japan. (4) It aids disarmament because it reaches only that strength which we proposed as a basis of agreement at the Washington conference and at the Geneva conference—300,000 tons of modern cruisers. Furthermore, the Washington conference reconvenes in 1931. This bill provides for the commencement of construction up to 1931 and not thereafter. If we are to witness further limitation of naval armament, in all probability, we will accomplish it then or not at all.

The bill harmonizes the military viewpoint with the civil viewpoint. It speaks of power and yet of peace. It speaks of security and yet of sacrifice. It involves no extravagance, but effects reasonable economy. It provides for no competition, but for reasonable competency. It possesses a modicum of the milk of human kindness in its direction for plans of salvage ships for the saving rather than for the destruction of human life. It is a program not of jingoism, but of justice to ourselves and to those with whom we have endeavored to treat. It builds ships not of paper, but of steel; not for defiance, but for defense. [Applause.] It suggests no aggression nor any aggravation to aggression. It does not reach parity, but it greatly reduces disparity. It violates neither the spirit nor the letter of any treaty which we have made nor of any which we have proposed. It expresses a desire for the realization of the hope of further disarmament, lately deferred but not yet defeated. So far as it is humanly possible, I believe this effort of the Naval Affairs Committee represents the conscience of America, speaking with a voice insistent upon the security of our traditions and treasure, yet the conscience of a nation fostering always, both by precept and by example, the cause of peace throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. SPEAKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HALE. If I have the time.

Mr. SPEAKS. The gentleman has made a splendid presentation of this bill. I want to know whether in the gentleman's opinion, if enacted into law, it would meet the demands for a reasonably adequate Navy, which the country seems to desire.

Mr. HALE. At present. And the virtue of the bill, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, is this: Following the Washington conference, if we succeed in a further limitation of armament, it is all we need; but, at the same time, if through failure of future agreement the need develops in 1931 for 10 additional cruisers the original program need not be interrupted, and it will be a simple matter to authorize and construct them.

Mr. SPEAKS. I have not quite completed my question. Go a little further: Can the gentleman justify the original proposal involving an expenditure of $750,000,000? In view of present world conditions and the desire for peace among the nations, with Christian people in all lands striving for the elimination of war, does not this action on the part of the United States, indicating a movement toward competition for naval supremacy, seem ill-timed and out of harmony with the ideas of our people in general and contrary to the spirit of our appeals for disarmament?

Mr. HALE. It is thoroughly justified from the viewpoint of our military needs; it is thoroughly justified from the viewpoint of parity agreed upon at Washington; but we have modified it here because of our hope with respect to 1931, when, in my opinion, there will be the last opportunity this generation will ever see for further disarmament. The further we become removed from the agony of the Great War the less likely we are to disarm; but we see then an opportunity to reach the agreement which we have sought for eight long years. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC and Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, it was my understanding the minority would use some time. Up to the present time I do not think they have used any.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend that I propose now to ask my esteemed colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], how many gentlemen have applied to him for time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, up to the present time the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has 30 minutes, and he will proceed now. Another gentleman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER], has 15 minutes, and the third gentleman is the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE]. They are the only three gentlemen on this side up to the present moment who desire time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] 30 minutes, understanding, of course, that the other two gentlemen will have their time, too.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill; but I come here to-day not to sink the Navy but to praise it. I think the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] stated the situation correctly when he said that it is the function of the Navy to represent the military viewpoint, while it is our function to reconcile that viewpoint with the needs of the country; and I want to concede right now that the Navy has made a better job of their task than we have of ours.

I do not agree with the gentleman from New Hampshire and with other speakers who state that our right to arm is here involved. That right is not questioned by anyone. I do not question it, and no one questions our right to build the ships provided in this bill, or even more ships. If war were imminent, there would be no question of the necessity of approving not only this bill but the recommendations originally made by the President for 71 vessels. If war were remotely possible, there would be justification for the approval of this bill.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not now, please.

Mr. SWING. I wanted to ask the gentleman how long it would take to build the ships after war became imminent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I state that there is not the slightest danger of war within the lifetime of any of the ships authorized in this bill.

Mr. SWING. That is what we thought before 1914.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will come to that in a moment, if you will give me a chance and do not get excited because we are considering a Navy bill.

Oh, there are a lot of gentlemen ready to declare war to-morrow. I am not. The situation in 1928 is not comparable with what the world situation was in 1914 or in 1917. There was a time, gentlemen, when it was necessary for the United States to build and maintain a large Navy, and at that time this country did build and maintain a Navy; but look back, if you will, and compare conditions of the world at the time we built the Navy with world conditions to-day. This does not require a great student of history. Conditions have changed. The map of the world has changed. The viewpoint of the people of the world has changed. The great nations have been through a World War. Aggressiveness and aquisition were the acknowledged attitude of most nations. Peace and tranquility to-day are the dominant thought of the people of all nations.

After the Spanish War this country found itself for the first time in history classed as a first-class Nation. We had become a "first-class Nation" in the military sense of that classification. We had taken on new responsibilities. We had taken possession of the Philippines. We had taken possession of Cuba and Porto Rico. Immediately upon the signing of the peace treaty with Spain we became a world power; and what was the condition of the world then?

Look at the map of Europe as it existed in 1898, 1899, and 1900. There was your great, powerful, strong Germany military machine; there was France arming to the teeth; England, then fearful of the German military machine, was commencing to build the most powerful navy in the world, equal to the combined navy of any two nations.

Russia was a powerful naval and military nation. The mighty Austro-Hungarian Empire had an army second to Germany and a navy equal to France. Shortly after this, in the early nineteen hundreds, is when the competitive armament race started its spurt which ended in 1917. As Germany increased her army Austria-Hungary kept pace; Russia increased hers, and France never fell behind, and England kept doubling her navy. As these powers of Europe increased their armies England kept increasing her navy, and then the "Dreadnought" era commenced. It was at that time that the United States, as a matter of self-preservation, had to start the building of a navy to meet any emergency. President Roosevelt had just about taken office when the Dreadnought-building race between Germany and England started.

As I said, aggressiveness and conquest were the watchwords of the day. Every nation was anxious to acquire world supremacy, and every nation felt that the destruction and domination of a neighboring nation was necessary for that supremacy. The thought of the abolition of war at that time was limited, indeed. Peace and abolition of war were only academic discussions. It is true that the Czar of Russia sought to bring about a world conference and a system of arbitration to take the place of war, but in those days any such suggestion was received with a great deal of suspicion. No one trusted anyone. The Hague Court idea was in its infancy and had received in some instances the color of official recognition, but never the confidence of all the great nations of the time. Greatness of nations were then measured by the number of divisions of standing conscript armies and the thickness of armor plate and tonnage of navies. The race kept on. It never ceased until the terrible conflict of 1917. On two or three occasions in the intervening 20 years it looked as if a world war would break out. England never dared stop her 2 to 1 naval program. While engaged in the Boer War, England kept her islands protected as if in a state of war with European nations. That was the state of mind of the world when this country built a large navy. It was necessary then to build many powerful battleships and to keep the United States Navy up to the last word in fighting machines. It was not only necessary to have the Navy but in those days to let the whole world know that we had this Navy.

During President Roosevelt's second administration the Battle Fleet was sent around the world. The mighty fleet created a profound impression on the war lords of the world. That was the condition of the world when we started to build this mighty Navy. We knew that sooner or later we would have a world war. Any student of history in this age knew that a conflict in Europe was inevitable and that a general European war in 1906 was avoided by a mere miracle. In 1906 England reversed her diplomatic policy and entered into an alliance with France, with the understanding that England would support the campaign of France in Morocco and that France would desist her propaganda in Egypt and would change her policy toward England's occupation of Egypt. That left Germany all by herself, with an ambitious colonization plan of her own.

Then this is what happened: Germany in retaliation on this understanding between France and England recognized the sovereignty of the Sultan of Morocco and challenged France's encroachment in Morocco. Russia seized this opportunity to cast greedy eyes toward the Balkans. Italy thought of her old troubles with Turkey and Austria-Hungary ready to take another slice from the map of Italy.

What a nice, friendly European family. It was then that the Sultan of Morocco, at the suggestion of the Emperor of Germany, asked for a world conference. The nations responded and a conference was held at Algeciras, and every nation, with one or two exceptions, sent representatives there. The United States was represented by Henry White and Samuel R. Gummerè. It was the conference at Algeciras in 1906 that prevented a world war.

Then what happened? Any student of history knew that Germany was so arming, that France was so arming, that England was so arming, and Austria-Hungary so militarized that the World War was inevitable. It did not require a student of history—even a Chicago politician would know that a world war was imminent in those days.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the difference between New York City and Podunk? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, New York City is not declaring war on England every day. [Laughter.] There are only two men in this country who believe war with England is possible, the mayor of Chicago and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], and neither of them would fight if we did go to war with England. Now, in 1914 the Archduke of Austria, Franz Ferdinand, was assassinated at Sarajevo, Serbia. Then followed a series of ultimatums from one nation to another and mobilization of armies and fleets. Serbia was invaded, and the World War was here. If there is one man in the world who lived through all of this and knows the cause and effect of excessive armament it is Viscount Grey, of England, who for 25 years was connected with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of his country. During the World War, before and after he was in the service of his country and in a position to know better than any man of his time of conditions which culminated in the World War, Viscount Grey in his book, Twenty-five Years, reviews the history of Europe, and the big climax of his book is where he states that armaments produced fear and not security. This is what he says:

> At this point, if thought is to progress, we must not let it stop at the determination of war guilt in 1914; we must enlarge it to consider the condition to which Europe had then been brought.
> Every country had been piling up armaments and perfecting preparations for war. The object in each case had been security. The effect had been precisely the contrary of what was intended and desired. Instead of a sense of security there had been produced a sense of fear, which was yearly increasing. Europe was afraid of the German Army. Germans encouraged in themselves and in others the belief that the German Army was invincible; but even they were becoming apprehensive that in a few years, when the armaments of their neighbors were perfected, even Germany might be afraid. Britain was not afraid of the German Army, because she believed herself to be an island that was out of the reach of any continental army; but the great increase of the German fleet made her watchful and she no longer felt at rest; indeed, she felt decided uneasiness at the thought of isolation.
> Such was the general condition of Europe; preparations for war had produced fear, and fear predisposed to violence and catastrophe.
> People in allied countries may say with truth that Germany, by forcing the pace in military and naval armaments, was more than anyone else responsible for this evil state of affairs. It was her policy of exclusive alliances and armaments after 1870 that produced this result. The truer this comment is, the more force does it give to the conclusion that follows from it. If the Allies, victors in the last war, pursue the same policy that Germany pursued after 1870, precisely the same untoward consequences will follow. Allied exclusive alliances and armaments will produce countercombinations and armaments—a German-Russian alliance this time, instead of a Franco-Russian. The notion that Germany can be kept permanently disarmed by temporary expedients such as foreign missions of control is an illusion.
> Time is going on; several years have passed since the armistice; human affairs do not stand still; people should be asking earnestly on what course is Europe moving? Is it on the old lines again, or is it on new lines that may lead to new security and not to the old fear? (Grey of Fallodon Twenty-five Years, p. 279.)

That is from a man who lived through the craze of competitive armament. That is from a man who during the period of competitive armament was compelled to see his nation build a navy equal to the combined strength of the navies of any two powers. In his book he analyzes the history of Europe and submits the definite conclusion that the building of enormous armies and tremendous navies did not avoid war but precipitated it. The big navy men and the big army men of Europe had their day. They had the fullest opportunity of demonstrating the soundness of their philosophy. Big armies, big navies are no longer a moot question. The world has had the bloody experiment. The German Emperor, who dreamed of a supreme empire ruling the world, controlling the highways of commerce from Berlin to Baghdad, lives to-day in exile and seclusion with all of his theories and principles entirely discredited. The French leaders who hoped for the day of entirely crushing their traditional enemy and assuming once more the might of their Napoleonic days see their country instead impoverished, the flower of the youth of the present generation dead or maimed, and their fair land in such financial destitution that it will take a century to recover. The Hapsburg dynasty who reigned by engendering the hatreds of different nationalities within the empire, whose only purpose was a selfish desire for might, pomp, and power, and whose covert ambitions were to extend their unhappy reign all through the Balkans, has been entirely annihilated. There is no Hapsburg dynasty to-day. The Czar of all the Russias, the most cruel, despotic Government in the history of the whole world, has been entirely eliminated in the course of his own evil works. Can it be said that the sponsors and believers of armaments, of big armies and big navies for defense only, if you please, have not had their day and opportunity of putting their theories into actual practice? The World War was the result of this school of thought. The disastrous World War was the outcome of all these years of military preparation. Surely civilization can at least learn something from the most costly, terrible, cruel war of all ages. The World War was the result of this school of excessive armament for "defense purposes."

We would have been involved had the conflict occurred in 1906. We were brought into it in 1917. Conditions to-day are different.

Now, what is the condition of Europe to-day? The mighty Austro-Hungarian Empire is wiped out, entirely dismembered. In its place there is the Republic of Austria and the small State of Hungary. From the once-military Austrian Empire several small independent nations were formed—Czechoslovakia and part of the Republic of Poland. Croatia, Slavonia, Bosnia, Dalmatia, and Herzegovina were joined with Serbia and now are part of that Kingdom. Transylvania and a portion of southern Hungary were joined with Rumania.

Austria as a mighty military power and troublemaker is no more. None of the new governments I have mentioned are a menace or threat to the safety of our country.

What is left of the Russian Empire? What has become of the Russian Navy? Russia now is no longer a great military power. From its former dominion the present Soviet Russian Republic emerged. The Republics of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and Ukrania were all carved out of the former Russian Empire. Finland was taken from the Empire and is now a republic, and part of the present Republic of Poland was taken from Russian territory. All these small countries have their own domestic problems, and while they may have their border and neighbor troubles they are of no menace or threat to the safety of our great Republic. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] do not fear an attack by the Swiss, Estonian, or the Latvian navies.

Mr. BUTLER. We do not fear anybody.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to tell the gentleman of whom we are afraid.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is the wave of communism—the socialists. What the gentleman from New York represents is what we fear. We fear people who talk just as the gentleman does.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All right; let me show you how the gentleman from Illinois talked when this country was in real danger, when our safety was actually threatened. At that time the gentleman from Illinois said:

> The wrongs of Germany, England, and all of the other belligerents which have been heaped upon us would not justify the loss of American lives.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois had the floor here when he uttered that statement.

Mr. BRITTEN rose.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I refuse to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Illinois took this floor and cringed when this country was confronted with a real danger, and let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that if he says I represent a danger to this country I was a student of history and world conditions when all that the gentleman from Illinois had ever read were the rules of the Marquis of Queensberry.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; the gentleman was a student, but a very poor one. It takes some men longer to learn things than others.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have not yielded. And I say to the gentleman that when the call of my country comes I will respond every time, and my record will bear me out. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, when I was rudely interrupted because I referred to the Marquis of Queensberry rules I was stating the condition of Europe to-day.

Powerful military Germany, one of the threats of the safety of the world, exists no longer. Alsace-Lorraine, with its plentiful coal and iron resources, part of the once German military machine, has been restored to France. Danzig, a strategic naval point of the north, has been declared an independent, free city. Posen has been joined to the Republic of Poland. Germany to-day, like Russia, has no navy. France, as I have already stated, although she may have been unwisely keeping up an unduly large army, is in such financial straits that she is in no position to engage in a war with a strong nation. Surely the splendid traditions of the past friendship, or better, let me say, the sisterhood between the Republics of France and of the United States, is such that we need not fear an armed conflict with that country, and surely the present splendid relations existing does not justify any fear at this time or for many years to come. Now, what does that leave us in Europe? Surely there is no immediate or remote danger of an armed conflict with the Scandinavian countries. One of these countries has even had the good sense to entirely disband her army. So that leaves only England, and I repeat that war between England and the United States is impossible. When I speak of England I have not in mind only Bond Street, London. I think of Great Britain as a great union composed of liberty-loving people, friends of the people of the United States. I think of the liberty-loving people who fought for the liberty now composing the Union of South Africa, Transvaal, and the Orange Free State.

I think of the democratic people of Australia and our neighbors and cousins of Canada. I am sure that, regardless of the greed of bankers or of commercial jealousies, regardless of the blunders of diplomacy, these people of Great Britain and the people of the United States will never permit war between the two nations. [Applause.] If we ever have another world war, and if Great Britain should be pitted against us, if we should permit that to happen, it will mean the destruction of thousands of years of civilization; we would not only have to rebuild the progress of the past but we will have to revise the Old Testament and rewrite the Gospels, and your new gospels would then be dictated by a philosophy of hatred and would not have been inspired by the Prince of Peace. [Applause.] And when I talk of war conditions of the future I know what I am talking about.

Constant comparison has been made as to the parity between our naval strength and that of Great Britain. Let me read to you what was said by the best friend the United States Navy ever had. Referring to the possibility of a naval building race with England, this great American said:

> Over here the representatives of the administration are demanding a navy bigger than that of Great Britain. The only possible interpretation of these facts is that the administration proposes to threaten Great Britain with having to get in a neck-and-neck competition with America to build the greatest navy in the world, and to do this as a bluff so as to make for Great Britain's adherence to Mr. Wilson's exceedingly nebulous ideas.
> Under these conditions the American people should, with common sense, look at what their own needs are and at what the needs of their allies are. Sooner or later any program will have to be tested by its results, and even if the United States started to emulate Great Britain's Navy the enthusiasm to do so would vanish when it appeared that there was no earthly interest of ours to be served by the action.
> Great Britain is an island, separated from the huge military commonwealths of Europe by very narrow seas, and separated from her own greatest colonies by all the greatest oceans. To her, supremacy in the navy is a matter of life and death. America ought to have a first-class navy, but if she did not have a ship she might yet secure herself from any invasion. But Great Britain's Empire would not last one week, and she could not make herself safe at home one week if her navy lost its supremacy. Incidentally to saving herself, the British Navy has rendered incalculable service to us during the last four and one-half years, and for the last 30 years has been a shield to the United States. Great Britain is not a military power in the sense that any of the nations of continental Europe, or indeed, of Asia, are military powers. She had almost as much difficulty in developing her army in this war as we had in developing our army. Her army is no more of a threat to other peoples than ours. Therefore, we Americans find ourselves, as regards the British Navy, in this position, that it is of vital consequence to Great Britain to have the greatest navy in the world; it is emphatically not of any consequence to us to have as big a navy as Great Britain, for we are not in the slightest danger from Great Britain, and under all ordinary circumstances the British Navy can be counted upon as a help to the United States and never as a menace.

And now get this prophetic statement by the great American, answering, or rather anticipating, the hope suggesting that a large building program could be of great strategic value in the event of another disarmament conference, he says:

> Under such circumstances, to get ourselves to work to build a navy in rivalry to Great Britain, and above all to do this as a political bluff is more than silly.

I read not from a pacifist but from an editorial in the Kansas City Star of December 7, 1918, written by Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.] Let us pause a moment to see what we are doing here.

Mr. UPDIKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. There have been several comparative tables of the strength of England, the United States, and Japan put into the RECORD. I have here the latest tables compiled by the Navy Department, dated October 1, 1927.

I will submit to any gentleman or the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs the question as regards capital ships; we are not behind, are we?

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman ask me the question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. We are not up unless we can recondition five of our ships. I dislike to make the answer public, but you have asked the question. I do not evade your question. The committee ought to know it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; but the gentleman will concede that the other nations have to repair their ships also.

Mr. BUTLER. They are making the repairs.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have appropriated here for all the repairs that have been asked for, and there is no opposition here to repairs. So that of capital ships we have 18 of 525,850 tons and Japan 10 of 301,320 and England 20 of 558,000 tonnage. Surely no cause for alarm in this class of ships.

Now, gentlemen, besides this bill, we have already appropriated and under construction $71,650,000 for new ships; 8 cruisers, amounting to $39,650,000; 3 submarines, amounting to $17,900,000; and 4 gunboats, amounting to $4,000,000. These ships and others under construction now total $71,650,000.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What the gentleman means is that the existing program now is carried by $72,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. That $72,000,000 has already been appropriated by the Congress.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The bill this year carries $72,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I said $71,650,000.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is giving comparative figures of the capital ships. Has the gentleman the figures in comparison of the cruisers built by Great Britain and Japan and the United States? Has the gentleman, roughly, the tonnage?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; cruisers not affected by the treaty; Great Britain has 56 of 354,000 tons and the United States 18 such cruisers of 155,000 tons.

Mr. WINGO. You mean the United States has 155,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. We have eight authorized.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about cruisers that are already built or under construction by the United States and Japan and England.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. One hundred and fifty-five thousand tons built and under construction in the United States, 354,000 by Great Britain, and 196,205 by Japan.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, that is the pending bill's major proposition of first-line cruisers. If we are in the third place now, why does the gentleman oppose the construction of all cruisers?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You can not take but one ship alone; you must take your entire fleet. And in the next place, you have got to take also into account the potential strength besides the actual strength of a fleet and the resources of the country. You have to take the mission a fleet would be called to perform. And when you consider all of these factors, you will see that there is no necessity at the present time, and that we are really not third or even second. It is not necessary to suggest that we are in a better financial position than any other country in the world. Granting, but not conceding, that another nation has a stronger navy, what nation is there to-day that has the resources, natural or financial, to use a navy effectively in a war against the United States? When we engage upon this program it may not be entering upon a competitive naval building race, but we are still certainly establishing a "keeping up with the Jones's" policy; and as we pass this naval bill, England, of course, will respond by adding to few more, and Japan will respond by adding a few more, with the result that a race will be started, whether we intended to or not, and God knows where it will end. That is my objection. I hope the gentleman will bear with me when I quote some papers on the reaction in other countries on this program. This program will certainly have a very detrimental effect on our leadership for the peace of the world.

Mr. BRITTEN. May I correct the gentleman's figures?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman can do it in his own time.

Mr. WINGO. I was trying to get information from the gentleman a while ago——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] tried to give it to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. No. He was trying to get me off on something else that was controversial. I am trying to get information from the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say that the best proof that there is no proof of immediate danger of war is the fact that the Department of the Navy is not insisting for any submarines. If there were the slightest danger of war in the next five years, the Navy Department would have insisted on the construction of more submarines, would they not?

Mr. WINGO. Why, of course. But we have already authorized submarines.

Mr. UPDIKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not just now.

Mr. UPDIKE. I desire the gentleman to be correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have appropriated for three submarines and they are being built. There are three more submarines authorized, and a great deal is made now of the fact that the committee has not asked for any destroyer leaders. This as an indication that the original building program has been materially reduced. No such thing. Congress has already authorized 12 destroyer leaders. Under the act of 1916 the authorization is sufficiently broad to include destroyer leaders, so that in addition to the authorization in this bill you have your act of 1916, which provides for 12 destroyer leaders.

Now, we are not being asked to appropriate for the ships heretofore authorized, but we are asked to increase the authorizations already made for 12 destroyer leaders, 8 cruisers, and 3 large submarines by adding 15 cruisers. You must also bear in mind that this bill not only authorizes but provides for 5 cruisers to be built in each of the years 1929, 1930, and 1931, and it provides that each one shall cost $17,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Not exceeding $17,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; not exceeding $17,000,000. The gentleman will remember that he informed this House one time, in his typically frank and honest manner, that not since he has been in this House for over 20 years has the cost of a ship gone under the estimated price.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that is right, and I want to say to my friend that I do not expect they will be built for any less than $17,000,000. But we put a time lock on so that this House can keep control of its own affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. These ships are not to cost more than $17,000,000, but judging from past performances they will cost more than that.

Mr. BUTLER. If you build them in navy yards they will cost 30 per cent more.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Government navy yards bid $3,000,000 less on each of three ships than private shipyards, yet the private yards received the contracts. While we are on that point, let me answer the argument that has been presented, to the effect that it is prudent to keep the shipyards busy. All right. If you want to keep the shipyards busy, I will vote for an appropriation of $270,000,000, but let us give the shipyards work in building mercantile ships. [Applause.]

Let us reinforce our poor, feeble, tottering, anemic, weak, and inadequate merchant marine. You gentlemen talk about the necessity of protecting trade. Well, you better have a merchant marine first to protect. I will vote for an appropriation to build these merchant ships in the shipyards. Then put some of your naval men on these ships to navigate them. There is no objection to that, and carry the blessings of American commerce to all parts of the world. It has been stated on the floor of the House that we have to protect our trade. I will tell you that no trade was ever acquired from the muzzle of a 16-inch gun. The only way we can have trade is by having the good will of other countries. Naturally we can not monopolize the trade of the world. We can not monopolize all of the trade of the world, because if we did all of the selling the nations of the world would have no buying power. That is elementary. We must have good will to maintain and protect our foreign trade. If we are to protect our merchant marine, let us at least first build a real merchant marine to protect. There will be no objection, I am sure, to the building of 40 or 50 first-class merchantmen, and that would keep our shipyards busy for some time.

I think it is the paramount duty of this country at this time to maintain our leadership for world peace, but this ambitious program impairs that leadership. Let me read just a few of the comments to which I referred before showing the reaction our naval program produced in England and in Japan. It is anything but wholesome.

The authoritative London Times says this, and I read from an extract contained in the Literary Digest of January 14, 1928:

> The outside world, which can detect in the present condition of the world no possible menace to the security or the prosperity of a great continental power, far removed by ocean distances from any conceivable attacking force, simply can not understand for the moment the object of this new and astonishing American naval effort. Here in this country we are acutely sensitive to the opportunities and dangers of the sea. As an island power, the center of an empire scattered amid the oceans, we are perpetually aware of our own naval needs, which have now been restricted, as far as may be, on a very careful calculation of the possibilities and probabilities of the near future. We have faithfully carried out the terms of the Washington agreement. The extent to which we have scrapped warships since the war is hardly realized even in our country. We were prepared to delay even a minimum replacement. To demonstrate our unwillingness to engage in any kind of naval competition with America or Japan, the two powers who might conceivably be our rivals at sea, the Government declared on November 17 that the construction of two of the cruisers provided for in the estimates for next year would be postponed. On the other hand, the Government of the United States, in spite of Mr. Coolidge's depreciatory reference to the "Old World competition in armaments," is now definitely embarked on an armaments program that is in fact competitive, is by implication provocative, and—to judge by a number of hints, pointers, and allusions—is at least designed partly with the object of making a strong impression on British opinion.

London Times proceeds further:

For the present, so far as our own country is concerned, it is necessary to make one point clear. A clause in the naval bill declares that "in the event of an international conference for the limitation of naval armament, the President is hereby empowered in his discretion to suspend in whole or in part any construction authorized by this act." It is suggested that this clause implies that the bill does not really mean what it says, and that its present purpose is to use indirect pressure to bring about another conference. If there is any basis at all for the suggestion—and it is difficult to attribute such motives to the authors of a bill which we are asked to take seriously—then it must be said at once that it is not by means of this kind that Great Britain will be induced to take a hand. The suggestion is wholly irrelevant. It implies, if it exists at all, that an entirely false interpretation of the British attitude at Geneva has gained currency in America and has even received official sanction. Our delegation and our Government had no ulterior purpose in that conference; its sole aim was the reduction of the burden of armaments. There was an initial error; sufficient pains were not taken by diplomatic means to elucidate all the implications of the American attitude. That error must not be repeated. But, for the moment, all that is necessary is to study carefully and quietly the diplomatic and political consequences of the new program of naval expansion. There can be no question of accepting any underlying challenge either to a new conference or to a fresh spurt in buildings.

The London Star thinks that the new American naval program may seem to come rather ungraciously on top of the British decision to lay down only one cruiser instead of the three contemplated for next year, but—

We hope it will not be made an excuse for carrying out the full program here. The British Admiralty has allowed itself to be led up a blind alley in regard to American competition in armament. Every authority entitled to speak has told us that in the pre-war years America was placed outside the calculations on which our own standards of armament were based, yet it is American standards which seem to have become the measure of our own. This country has now a chance to get back on a surer basis, and make it clear that it refuses to enter into an armament race with the States.

The London Daily News frankly states that such a program is anything but helpful to the cause of disarmament.

There is nothing to stop America from building as many ships as she likes—

Rather quaintly remarks the London Daily News—

except the common sense of the American taxpayer, who has been rather rigorous in his scrutiny of this sort of expenditure in the past and is not likely to be less so in the future.

We are reminded then that—

It has generally proved a popular and easy thing to launch a big-navy program in the States and a much less popular and easy thing to pass the bill to pay for it. So far as this country is concerned, the number of ships which America chooses to build is no concern of ours. Beyond a vague promise of continued cooperation with the league in its investigations, the President's message contains nothing helpful to the cause of disarmament. Here again the arguments advanced are the old arguments that have been used to defend militarism from the earliest days.

The London Evening Standard has this to say:

There can be no ground in this case for the kind of race which proceeded between Great Britain and Germany after the launch of the first Dreadnought up to the verge of the Great War. That should be clear to the common sense of both nations. Our Admiralty and our Government will have to consider what provision must be prudently made for the general security of the Empire and the special needs of our overseas trade. But it would be equally absurd and dangerous to enter on a program of construction which could by any possibility be interpreted as a challenge or the acceptance of a challenge.

Security is, after all, a relative term, and "reeking tube and iron shard" are not the sole elements of national safety. Others as important are the spirit and enterprise of the nation, its financial resiliency, and the extent of the margin between actual and potential power.

Now, let me read an Associated Press dispatch printed in the Washington Post of Monday, January 16, 1928, which indicates the reaction in Japan when the original naval building program was first announced:

TOKYO, January 15.—The vernacular newspapers are generally adopting a hostile attitude toward the recently announced American naval program. Asahi sarcastically remarks:

"America recommends to France an extension of the treaty outlawing war, yet she recommends for herself an expansion of naval building."

The United States is warned by Hochi that she is antagonizing the whole world in carrying out a huge naval expansion program to satisfy her vanity, while Jiji, after lauding the spirit prompting America's reply to France, asks:

"But does not the proposal to carry out the naval expansion disclose the game America has played at the expense of the world?"

Oh, yes; I can hear the murmur "What do we care what others say," and "It is nobody's business what we do or what we build," but, gentlemen, permit me to state that the very consideration of appropriations for Army and Navy carries with it a consideration of our foreign relations. We do not build a Navy for recreation. We do not build a Navy to look at. A Navy is built for one purpose only, and that is to attack the ships of other countries or to defend against an attack of ships of other countries. So it is natural therefore and proper to consider our relations at this time with the countries of the world in deciding whether or not the safety of the country requires this enormous expenditure. It is also proper and, in fact, our duty to consider what effect such a naval program may have on our present existing friendly relations with other countries. Surely if the engaging in a vast naval building plan is going to disturb the friendly feelings now existing between nations of the world that is something to be considered. That is why I read these comments from foreign newspapers, because they surely reflect the views of the people of those countries. As I have already stated, arguments used on the floor of this House, expressions of imminent conflict, presumed dangers, the necessity of being prepared in the near future will all be used in the parliaments of other countries as a justification for more appropriations, for more warships, and for larger armies. That is the very thing that many of us are seeking to avoid. With the present condition of the Navy—and here let me state that in destroyers, submarines, and mine layers we are way ahead of both England and Japan. Taking the Navy as a whole it compares more than favorable with the navies of either of these two countries. So if the justification for this enormous increase together with what Congress has already provided for is based on fear of a possible conflict or on the inferiority of our Navy, I say that it is not justified on either of these grounds.

I am not going to be swept off my feet by charges that I am a pacifist. To say that a larger Navy is necessary to combat communism or socialism, as the gentlemen from Illinois suggests, is silly. That is one of the silliest arguments that was ever made. The only way to combat radicalism and bolshevism is by making the conditions in this country such that the people can live in happiness and in peace. [Applause.] Look at the former strength of Russia, with all of her tremendous military power, with all of her oppression and her haughty aristocracy and special privileges, and you have a living lesson of what creates extreme radical conditions. Look at Germany and its tremendous military power and see how an idea destroyed all of that. It is not an argument worth answering to say that you need a fleet to combat ideas. You can only combat ideas and ideals with better ideas and better ideals.

A program of 71 ships was originally the demand. The reaction from this entire country was against that program. I received letters from all parts of the country protesting against the original program; so did the President of the United States; and so did every Member of Congress, I dare say. Now, you come in with a bill and word is sent out to the country that we are building only 15 cruisers, while, as a matter of fact, we have already authorized 12 destroyer leaders, 8 cruisers, and 6 submarines.

Now that the distinguished Secretary of the Navy is on the floor I want to call his attention to something. I intended writing him yesterday. I believe that the facts concerning the relative strength of the Navy ought to come from Washington. I think that part of it ought to be left to the chosen representatives of the people. I have here, if I have not mislaid it, a statement sent to the press by the naval recruiting office in Brooklyn, which would indicate that the United States is hopelessly behind other nations in tonnage, number of ships, and in naval strength, and creating such a sense of fear and insecurity that it is necessary to increase the Navy at once.

It seems to me the recruiting officers, who are subordinate officers of the Navy, should not be made press agents. There is great danger of a lot of misinformation being sent out. I have misplaced it now, but I have it among my papers and I will bring it to the Secretary's attention officially, that it does not behoove the Navy to instruct its subordinate officers stationed in various cities to send out statements to the press to the effect that this country is in great danger unless we approve this bill.

I will not quarrel with the Navy as to the recommendations it has made. That is the Navy's job. I say that every time we send the Navy on a mission it performs its services well. My complaint is that we should not have sent the Navy on a great many of the missions we have sent it upon, because that is not its function. [Applause.] I say that one of the blackest blots on our history is our conduct down in Haiti. That was not a proper mission to assign to the Navy; but it was not the fault of the Navy; it was the fault of whatever administration sent it down there.

Gentlemen, I am not afraid to take a stand on this bill, as I will take a stand on every matter that comes before the House. I am absolutely sincere in my belief that this country has a great mission to perform in assuming leadership in the world for peace. I believe we are so fortunately situated, that our resources are so tremendous, that our strength, military and otherwise, is so great that we are not in danger of attack from any source in the world. I am not afraid of Japan. We can take care of that situation. Japan has no desire to enter into war with the United States unless we instigate it and test the patience of that country. They have their own problems to solve. They have many problems to solve. So there is no danger of an attack from that sourec.

The resources of Japan are such that it can not engage in a war with the United States. Gentlemen, just stop to consider the distance, the tremendous line of communication that Japan would have to establish and maintain in order to wage war against this country, and you will see that with the present known weapons of warfare and under the existing conditions, both here and in Japan, there is no reason for anticipating trouble with that country.

Yes; I suppose some one is ready to ask me about the Philippines. The solution to that is simple. The time has arrived for the United States to keep its promise to the people of the Philippines and to grant them their independence. Independent Philippines is of far greater value to the United States than the territory of the Philippines. The splendid loyalty of the Filipinos and their devotion to the United States and sincere appreciation for all that the United States has done for them is the guarantee and the absolute assurance that the Filipinos as an independent nation will always be the best friend of the United States in the Far East. Japan is not looking for trouble with the United States. Naturally Japan has her jingoists just as we have our jingoists in this country, but the people of Japan and the people of the United States have grown to know and learn that the jingoists who declare war with their mouths in time of peace are not the men who do the fighting in time of war. The relations between Japan and the United States were never better. Fears and misunderstandings of the past do not exist to-day.

Our Navy to-day is quite ample to protect our coasts. A proper, well-equipped aviation service, which we can create and put into operation in a short time, can amply and thoroughly protect our coasts in the event of any danger or even remote threat of danger.

War between Great Britain and the United States is simply unbelievable, and taking any combination of other countries of the world, we are in no danger of being attacked. That is why I have taken this position. That is why I say there is no immediate necessity for this bill at this time.

We have authorized sufficient ships and we are now appropriating enough to build new ships to bring our Navy up to the requirements of any immediate purpose. We have other things to do. I am not ashamed to say that we could use this $200,000,000 for a much better purpose. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. McCLINTIC rose.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has 54 minutes in favor of the bill and 1 hour and 20 minutes in opposition to the bill; and the gentleman from Oklahoma has 1 hour and 27 minutes left at his disposal, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] has 1 hour and 15 minutes at his disposal.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I have asked one of my colleagues to speak at this time, and I would like to have him recognized for 10 minutes—the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. BRITTEN. The Chair evidently did not hear the gentleman controlling the time on this side. The gentleman has just yielded me 20 minutes, and I would like to proceed now with the time that has just been allotted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is satisfactory to the gentleman from Oklahoma, who has more time left?

Mr. BUTLER. I think, in view of the personal attack that has been made upon the gentleman, he should have the opportunity of replying. That is always fair play among American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, first of all let me say that anything I may have said that even hinted at being unkind to my young friend from New York, I will take out of the RECORD, and when he referred to his own future retirement from the House I should have said I hoped it would not be soon. Because opposition of this kind in any community is interesting; it may even prove instructive. It did evidence one fact to-day—his complete lack of knowledge of the bill before the House. When asked by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] the simplest question about the number of cruisers, he blandly raised his chin in the air and said, "We are appropriating for 22." When the truth of the matter is we are now appropriating for 8. His entire statement was equally inaccurate.

The gentleman opened his remarks by saying "if war were imminent" this bill would pass the House immediately. My friends, it will take six years to complete the building program in this bill, and if war were imminent I am sure we would not be giving consideration to this kind of a bill—we would be voting on something entirely different.

Mr. UPDIKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I would rather not for the time being. I will yield later.

The gentleman suggested that New York is not declaring war on England every day like Chicago. The gentleman did not tell you that on the 4th of February, 1928, President Coolidge made a speech, more or less in executive session, at the Press Club here, in which he said:

> Whenever any of the press of our country undertake to exert their influence in behalf of foreign interests, the candor of the situation would be greatly increased if their foreign connections were publicly disclosed.

The President evidently had in mind two great newspapers in New York. The gentleman from New York knows the newspapers I have in mind and so does almost everybody else on the floor of the House.

That is one of the reasons there is no clamor against England in New York, as the gentleman says.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Not now. I will get the gentleman some time.

The gentleman [Mr. LAGUARDIA] of course knows that New York is completely tied up to England, financially, commercially, and socially; that its principal press is subsidized in favor of Great Britain.

Why should the New York Times editorially be against this bill? Why should the New York World editorially be against the bill? The managing editor of the New York Times for 30 years has been a British subject, refusing to become an American citizen. If he is now an American citizen it is a very recent action.

The man who writes the Army and Navy editorials for the New York Times is a cousin of the British consul general in New York City. Do you wonder why we read those editorials in disgust?

The Baltimore Sun, a pro-British sheet, is another one that the President doubtless had in mind and by whom you gentlemen are likely to be criticized if you vote for this bill. The vote is going to be light, for with the exception of the Socialist Party there is no request for time except from the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Gentlemen, run down the newspapers who oppose this legislation. Look into their editorial departments and you will find Rhodes scholarship men, British subjects, propagandists, and pacifists controlling them. You will find British connections. I agree with my young pacifist friend [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that there is no immediate likelihood of a war with England or with Japan. It is not imminent; but when he suggests that England is an island with far-flung commerce and ought to have a larger navy than ours, he is forgetting that last year $21,000,000,000 worth of deep-sea business went from the ports of this Nation to every port in the world. Will not the gentleman agree with me that our $21,000,000,000 worth of manufactured and raw products are entitled to the same protection on the seas that other great countries cherish for their industries? Why, of course.

Mr. BERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I know that the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to assist me.

Mr. BERGER. Then why do you not let me? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. This bill is like fire insurance. I used to represent the twenty-third ward in Chicago. It was stated that there was not a pauper or a millionaire in the entire ward. There were many fine citizens of foreign extraction in that ward. When an agent called upon a German owner of a frame building and asked him to take fire insurance on his little home he would say, "Why should I take a fire-insurance policy? I have lived here 21 years, raised a family, and we have never had a fire." He stays at home on Fourth of July and watches his little house. The old twenty-third ward did not need a fire department nor a police department, and yet the most of them carried fire insurance. A protection for an emergency.

It is hard to answer many ideal socialistic questions. One gentleman came before the committee, and he wanted to know who we were going to fight, where are we going to fight them, and why should we fight them?

Just like the little German in my district who says, "Why should I have a fire-insurance policy; why should I take out an accident policy?" It is almost impossible to answer those questions. Good business justifies building a Navy. There is no question about that. In every walk of life—I will put it this way—there is no walk of life on this earth where weakness is declared a strength except by such gentlemen as I am following, the pacifist, the idealist, the communist who says you must weaken yourselves to show your leadership and strength.

A professor of Swarthmore University came before the committee and offered his advice. He said we ought to have a Navy composed of small gunboats such as we have on the Great Lakes, and when they become obsolete we should not replace them. When asked about heavy guns, he said, "Why should we fight; why should we think of fighting?" I remarked that President Coolidge said that "war was accidental." Well, war is accidental.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] also said in one of his intelligent moments on the floor that the naval experts did not request any submarines. The truth of the matter is the President's bill that came here with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy requested 35 submarines.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will yield to the gentleman, although he would not yield to me.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know that the original program included 35 submarines, but the committee did not recommend any.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; the committee did not for this reason: We have 93,000 tons of submarines now, much more tonnage than any other nation. We also still have three authorized for which no appropriations have ever been asked. They were authorized 12 years ago.

With that in mind, why authorize 35 additional? Let us clean up those already authorized. It was treated as a business proposition. Of the 21 members of this Committee on Naval Affairs, all but 1 were unanimous for this bill. We sat for weeks taking testimony of all sorts of individuals, experts, pacifists, and near communists. One of our witnesses was referred to in the New York Herald-Tribune editorially as a nationally known international anarchist. But we heard them all. Then we sat down in executive session, and this bill is the result. I really think the bill is a better bill for the national defense than the bill that was sent to the Congress by the President of the United States, which provided for 74 ships as against these 16. This provides for a time limit on them, of course. I am not going into the figures, because they have been ably presented to you already, but there was a lot of opposition to any great expansion of the Navy. That opposition came from a number of so-called peace societies, pacifists, and communist societies. The larger of the group were the Church Peace Union and the World's Alliance for International Friendship. Those two organizations are very big ones and do business under the Carnegie Foundation fund. They were represented by four of their executive trustees. Of the four, three of them were for a navy. The other one was the gentleman I just referred to a little while ago as being referred to as an international anarchist. The spokesman for these two great church organizations said that they represent between 30,000,000 and 50,000,000 Christian churchgoers, and he wound up his testimony by saying that pending an international conference agreement for the reduction or limitation of armament:

> We are for the spirit of the Washington conference, the 5–5–3 ratio.

That expression comes from these great church organizations, and this bill before you to-day does not begin to reach the 5–5–3 ratio. On the contrary, I wanted to give the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] some figures which were desired by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. He wanted to know the comparative status of our cruisers to-day. To-day we have built and building 18 cruisers, while Great Britain has 63—and I am talking now about cruisers less than 20 years of age—and Japan 33. In tonnage our tonnage is as of 146,000, and Great Britain's 386,000, as against Japan's 206,000. In ratio we are 1.9, Japan 2.7, and Great Britain 5.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman's figures do not agree with the figures that I have.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am trying to show that the gentleman's figures are not correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I got these from the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, no; they could not have told the gentleman they were appropriating for 24 cruisers. I do not know where the gentleman got his figures, but they are all wrong. Now, let us presume for the purpose of figuring that all of the 15 ships in this bill will be completed in six years. Let us assume, which is a rather violent presumption, that England will not build another ship in the next six years, nor will Japan. At the end of those six years the ratios in tonnage will show Japan to be 2.7, and we will be 3.8, while England will be 5. In other words, just about 35 per cent stronger than we are in cruiser strength. Mark you, I am not talking about battleships now, nor of comparative naval strength.

It is well known that England is stronger than we are in battleships. Every person who came before the committee, including these church organizations, realized that England is stronger than we are in battleship strength. One of those who represented the church organizations was Doctor Gordon, a dignified and learned man, who went to the Geneva conference as a listener-in. He told the committee that in his opinion we were weaker than England in battleship strength, and that is quite correct.

Mr. KVALE. Do not the figures stated by the gentleman prove that the Washington disarmament conference was a complete fiasco?

Mr. BRITTEN. It all depends upon the point of view. I think we made a great mistake in scrapping our modern ships. The only thing that caused the failure of the Geneva conference was the refusal of Great Britain to scrap her modern ships. Let me go a little further on this matter of tonnage. This bill is not in conflict with the Washington conference, nor is it in conflict with the proposals of our delegates to the Geneva conference. We offered to meet with England at 300,000 tons cruiser strength. England came down to 590,000 tons, and finally was willing to come down to about 400,000 tons under certain conditions. So that no portion of this program when completed will ever be scrapped. It is inconceivable to presume that the British or the Japanese will ever scrap down to meet these figures, we are so far below them.

Mr. Chairman, a very estimable Member of the House called on me a little while ago and wanted some time in opposition to the bill. I told him that he could have some, after I had had consultation with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]. He said that he was inclined to look with favor on the minority report. I asked him whether he had read it, and he said that he had.

Mr. Chairman, the minority report is so fantastic, so impossible, that Grimm's Fairy Tales never had anything more pleasant to read than this minority report by one man.

Mr. McCLINTIC rose.

Mr. BRITTEN. I shall yield in a moment to the gentleman. This minority report provides in one case, for instance, for changing battleships of 40,000 tons into aircraft carriers by putting a deck over the top of the turrets. The deck, according to the best expert figures, will be about 320 feet long, so that it will go beyond the bow of the battleship and over the guns. When the big guns are to shoot, the flying deck will be raised like a jackknife bridge; and as it is only a little more than half as high as the Washington Monument, it will not weigh over a thousand tons.

Mr. BUTLER. No trouble at all to get out in the water and raise it!

Mr. BRITTEN. When you raise it up the captain on the bridge will not be able to see through it, and the men in the fire-control mast will not be able to see over it, so that in all probability the minority report will have to be modified so as to provide that this deck shall be made of glass. Wired glass so it will not splinter when hit. When the wind hits this thing standing up in the air, of course, the battleship will overturn. But they will probably amend the minority report again and provide that when the ship overturns it will be a submarine. [Laughter.]

We talked with the experts in the committee about this wonderful fairy tale and got a good laugh. The minority report says further that it will give our battleships not the range of 18 miles, but the range of 200 miles, because they will have a lot of bombers aboard to destroy any enemy. If they ever shoot a gun off on one of those battleships, they will never get back, because the gunfire will tear the platform all to pieces.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I have learned from our experts that that can be done.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman said his views are approved by certain officers and experts, not in this country, but in England. Lieutenant Commander Kenworthy, in England, and some British admiral were referred to. They are in favor of it, of course.

Mr. BUTLER. Kenworthy came and talked to me about it. They do not want us to build these cruisers.

Mr. BRITTEN. Every officer in the British Navy would be in favor of the minority. Its adoption would be a great day for England.

Mr. McCLINTIC. No one in the British Navy has been conferred with on the subject that I was referring to, but officers of the American Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois 10 minutes more. And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] will have his 18 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will yield to the gentleman for a question. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKS. Do you mean to say that a majority of the Christian people you refer to favor a naval program of the character presented in this bill, which is, of course, in addition to the regular naval appropriation of approximately $300,000,000?

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not pretend to represent the Christian people at all. I was telling of what Dr. Linley V. Gordon said to the committee. I was precise in my remarks when I said that pending an international agreement for the limitation of armaments Doctor Gordon said his association was in favor of the spirit of the Washington conference, the 5-5-3 ratio for the Naval Establishment.

Mr. SPEAKS. But the Washington conference simply places limitations on the maximum strength of our Navy. There are no conditions warranting such a program as you are advocating in this bill and the people are not approving it.

Mr. BRITTEN. What does it require?

Mr. SPEAKS. Nothing except that we keep within the limitations. I hope the gentleman will yield to a few questions which will assist in establishing the attitude of the so-called Christian people on this important subject.

Mr. BRITTEN. No. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] will give you time sometime later. Do not consume my time, if you please. The gentleman's version of an adequate Navy is so different from mine that the two can not fit in with each other. The gentleman can say what he wants to, in his own time.

Now, with reference to these other pacifist organizations that have bombarded Congress, there are two others of communistic tendency. One of them is represented by a gentleman who is in the gallery right now. He is usually referred to either as a pacifist or a pacifist-communist or a patron of that kind, because of his preaching around the country. He is the principal payroller on the National Council for the Prevention of War—a very high-sounding name—and his name is Frederick J. Libby.

Now, Frederick J. Libby is not permitted to address the school children of the District of Columbia at any time, because of his attempted destruction of famous and heroic characters, the men who made this country what it is. The Board of Education of the District of Columbia unanimously refused him permission even to address the school children at any time.

He, representing this organization of the high-sounding name, the National Council for the Prevention of War, is the principal payroller of the establishment, and he goes all over the country making speeches against the naval establishment, the Army, preparedness, and the national defense; almost the same type of argument as is used by the leader of the Socialist Party, Mr. LAGUARDIA, or as was used by him a few moments ago. That man, with his associations and connections, some of them communistic, some of them labor, some of them socialistic, some of them pacifists, and some of them connected with church organizations, sends out letters indiscriminately, suggesting to the recipients—

> Write your Members of Congress; have your friends write to their Members of Congress against all this terrible expansion of the Navy that will drive us to war; it means war.

That man is responsible for the fact that you gentlemen and I myself are getting hundreds of letters from people who, to say the least, are misguided.

Mr. Libby was quoted before the committee as having said that he—> did all he could to defeat the carrying out of the national defense act—and that when the draft act became a law—

> he [Libby] joined the Quakers.

After the testimony of Mr. E. B. Johns, of Washington, D. C., I received the following letter from Mrs. Laura Puffer Morgan, who appears to be the active mind of the National Council for the Prevention of War:

NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR PREVENTION OF WAR,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1928.

DEAR MR. BRITTEN: On consulting the transcript of the stenographer's notes of the hearing of Friday, February 17, before the House Naval Affairs Committee, when you were acting chairman, I was surprised to find that through omissions the record is incomplete, and by being so manipulated is not only inaccurate but completely misleading. The permission that you gave me to file a document for insertion in the record was omitted, as well as the document itself. I was further surprised to find that at the very end of the hearing there was recorded an objection by Mr. WOLVERTON, a member of the committee, to the insertion of the document I presented. This objection, if it was raised before adjournment, was made in the confusion permitted to prevail just as the committee was breaking up, so that many present, with whom I have talked, as well as I, myself, did not hear it.

Whatever may be your explanation, these facts remain. You were acting chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee on February 17. You directed the proceedings of the committee. You and members of your committee encouraged statements from witnesses unfriendly to the National Council for Prevention of War and its executive secretary. These statements became so glaring in their incorrectness that I arose and volunteered to give correct information. Upon your refusal to hear me, for the enlightenment of the committee and to answer these false statements which the committee had elicited I filed a document, this being a letter addressed to the Daughters of the American Revolution of New Windsor, Conn., by Daniel Howard, superintendent of schools.

This document was delivered to your committee upon your statement that it would be received. It was delivered to the committee for insertion in the record. It gave the correct information regarding Mr. Frederick J. Libby, executive secretary of the National Council for Prevention of War, who was being unfairly attacked and slandered. The exclusion of this document which I filed, after it had been formally accepted, without my knowledge and consent, and the retention of other testimony of complete inaccuracy does not fall short of falsifying the record. I have the names of a number of people who were present at the hearing, who can confirm these statements and are willing to have their confirmation made a part of the record of your committee.

I am well aware that you are protected in this matter by the rules of your committee. I am authoritatively informed that it has a ruling which will exclude from the record any matter to which there is objection by a Member. That permits your committee to make propaganda of its records by keeping out anything whatever, regardless of its importance and value, which will be unfriendly to the majority opinion of the committee. I also understand perfectly that the objection raised by Mr. WOLVERTON was made as a last desperate effort to bolster up the position of the committee. Mr. WOLVERTON gives as his reason for excluding Mr. Howard's letter that it "contains many statements that are disputed." This reason would apply equally well to the remarks of other witnesses with reference to Mr. Libby, since they are emphatically disputed and denied in Mr. Howard's letter.

In order that you may understand just what the committee, by acquiescing in this action, has made itself a party to, let me be more specific. Mr. E. B. Johns, one of the witnesses, in the course of his testimony quoted from what he said was the report adopted by the Board of Education in excluding Mr. Libby from the public schools of Washington. The fact is that not one sentence of what he quoted appears in this report, a copy of which I inclose. This can easily be verified by application to the secretary of the Board of Education. Other statements made by this and other witnesses are equally false.

Can the House Naval Affairs Committee—and in particular the man who was at the time responsible for its actions—afford to accept such false statements, unsupported by evidence, about a third person, much less encourage them, without giving that person an opportunity to reply?

We all appreciate the importance to a public servant of keeping his record honest, fair, and creditable. Action so flagrantly unscrupulous as this of the House Naval Affairs Committee may accomplish its immediate purpose but in the long run can only give rise to public censure and create public distrust.

For these reasons I must request that you either insert in the record the letter of Daniel Howard or expunge from it the statements defamatory to Mr. Libby.

Yours very sincerely,

LAURA PUFFER MORGAN,
Associate Secretary.

Hon. FRED A. BRITTEN,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, I immediately replied to the above letter as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 5, 1928.

Mrs. LAURA PUFFER MORGAN,
National Council for Prevention of War,
532 Seventeenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. MORGAN: Replying to your letter of March 2, which was accompanied by a copy of a report adopted by the District of Columbia Board of Education, January 21, 1925, I would respectfully remind you of the fact that when the committee hearing adjourned on Friday, February 17, 1928, there was considerable confusion in the committee room because several ladies were clamoring for recognition at the same time and the chairman had some trouble in maintaining order and quiet. The stenographer's report of the meeting speaks for itself.

I do not know the contents of the letter written by the superintendent of the public schools of Windsor, Conn. (favoring Mr. Libby), which you sought to have made a part of the committee record, but I do know that it was kept out of the record by motion of Mr. WOLVERTON when he said, "I do not feel that either of the persons (the school superintendent or Mr. Libby) should be given the benefit of the statements contained in this letter, without their personal appearance before the committee for such examination as the committee may desire to make," and the letter in question can only be inserted in the record by action of the committee itself.

The second subject matter of your letter refers to the testimony of Mr. E. B. Johns before the committee. You say that he has misquoted the report adopted by the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, a copy of which is forwarded with your letter.

I do not have the testimony of Mr. Jones before me, but the report which was adopted by the District of Columbia Board of Education (unanimously) includes the following findings, viz:

"It was evident that there was considerable opposition from citizens and bodies of citizens to Mr. Libby's request for permission to speak in the schools."

"In the hearing Mr. Libby stated that his views in regard to war and national preparedness are based upon his religious convictions.

"Our school histories recite the deeds of these renowned Americans, so that we are not surprised that in the hearts of our boys and girls they stand out as national heroes, and rightly so. Every American boy and girl should be permitted to cherish the memory of these heroes. Whatever may be the horrors of war, and however we may be opinioned in regard to war or the means for its prevention, we can not permit the heroic sacrifice of the men who gave their lives for their country to be minimized. Your committee is convinced that the patriotic sentiments of the average American boy or girl should not be confused by any teaching that the ancestors may not have been prompted by the highest motives in the prosecution of war or that the war in which they fought was a great national blunder.

"We are convinced that the American people by and large have 'highly resolved that these dead shall not have died in vain.'

"Your committee holds that Mr. Frederick J. Libby entertains extreme views on the public questions that he has discussed in regard to war and preparedness, and therefore recommends that his request to speak in the schools be denied."

Notwithstanding your statement to the contrary, I can not understand how anything could be more damaging to the career and character of Mr. Libby than the unanimous finding of the District of Columbia Board of Education as represented in the report which you have forwarded to me. If Mr. Johns goes further, he certainly is an exaggerist.

Have you forwarded the printed findings of the District of Columbia Board of Education also for insertion in the record or merely for comparison with the testimony of Mr. Johns?

I am truly disappointed that Mr. Libby could not have appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs, as there are many more or less important and probably misleading attachments to the National Council for Prevention of War as well as to himself which might be cleared by his presence before the committee.

If not inconsistent with the workings of your council, will you be good enough to send me copies of the resignations or the correspondence which has led up to the resignation from the National Council for Prevention of War of the following institutions, viz:

National Kindergarten Association, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Girls Friendly Society, National Catholic Welfare Council, National Grange, National Congress of Mothers, Parent-Teachers Association, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

I could probably get this information from each of these societies above mentioned, but I am sure that it can be done much quicker through your council.

If you have a copy of the remarks of Mr. Libby at Wellesley Hills Congregational Church in Boston, on or about February 26, 1924, wherein he said that "he would not fight for the flag," I would very much appreciate having an extract of same.

I note that the executive board of the National Council for Prevention of War contains the name of the Rev. Joseph R. Sizoo, of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church. Is Doctor Sizoo really a member of the executive board or has his name been taken from it; and if so, for what reason? I am told that it is carried on your stationery against his expressed wishes.

I am told that Mr. Libby's News Bulletin of December 24, 1921, states that "Poland should feed its own children," but on February 11, 1922, the Bulletin makes an appeal "to America for the relief of starving Russia." (In the News Bulletin of February 11, 1922, Mr. Libby accepts sole responsibility for everything which appears in the Bulletin, and in the issue of that date he is an advocate of Soviet Russia.)

If you have any stationery showing the different names of your council or organization, I will very much appreciate having a sample of each. In other words, was your council once named the National Council for Limitation of Armament? Was it subsequently changed to National Council for Reduction of Armament? When and why was it changed to its present name?

In Mr. Libby's book What Price Peace he says there is no peace, and in his summary of argument in this book he states: "Potential causes of war confront us on every hand. Peace has not come." I am wondering if you have any printed data aimed to justify his present contention that we should be a nation unable to defend ourselves against the aforesaid "potential causes of war which confront us on every hand."

Have you any record of the refusal of the San Diego (Calif.) Board of Education to permit Mr. Libby to speak before the school children of San Diego, and if so, will you be good enough to forward copy of same for my files? Was he at that time (1925) prevented from distributing great quantities of printed pamphlets, which said that the United States was deliberately trying to start war with Japan by fortifying the Hawaiian Islands and by sending ships on the Australian friendship cruise?

Please be assured, Mrs. Morgan, that as one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs it is my desire to give Mr. Libby every consideration possible.

Yours very sincerely,

FRED A. BRITTEN, M. C.

P. S.—Will you be good enough to forward for my files copies of the above-dated News Bulletins?

F. A. B.

Mr. Chairman, on March 7, 1928, Mrs. Morgan answered this letter by saying that she considered it "to be irrelevant to the subject under discussion" and, of course, refrained from answering any of my questions about Mr. Libby.

Mr. Johns said that the Washington Post of January 23, 1925, gave Libby's record as a superpacifist, and he quoted a report from the District of Columbia Board of Education which placed Libby as one of the recognized leaders in the movement originated with the avowed enemies of this country.

Like the other pacifist organizations with high-sounding names, the stationery of the Council for the Prevention of War shows dozens of participating and cooperating organizations with equally high-sounding names, but a number of them are distinctly communistic in their attitude toward the National Government.

The council turns out much literature of extreme views suggesting to whoever may read it that he "write your Member of Congress and your Senators and get your friends to do likewise."

Is it any wonder that Members of the House were besieged with letters from misguided persons, principally women and girls, to prevent this horrible warlike gesture on the part of Uncle Sam? This gesture which would make England get mad and France cross and Japan peeved.

I know of no other walk in life where the theory that "weakness is an evidence of strength" is seriously presented to intelligent men and women.

The pacifist would have us lay down our arms completely, do away entirely with an Army and a Navy, make yourself just as weak as the most humble caterpillar and then cry out to the world to make itself equally weak. That is the strength of character that should be shown by America, the America that these professional pacifists desire. God forbid that they shall ever succeed.

I am quite satisfied that the America of to-day will not permit pacifism or foreign propaganda to take it off the seas.

While the American pacifists are doing the work of foreign interests in trying to paralyze the Navy, the foreigners themselves execute shrewd moves calculated to show that other powers are not only not increasing their naval strength but are actually trying to bring about limitation of armaments. I refer to the gesture of Great Britain to France for a naval conference looking toward the reduction in size of capital ships. It would not surprise me if France were asked to call the conference as she has few, if any, first-class ships. Great Britain would like another scaling down of battleship sizes and perhaps a little more scrapping now that she has the two greatest battleships in the world, the Rodney and the Nelson, just completed.

With thirteen 10,000-ton cruisers laid down since the Washington conference, Great Britain is in a fine position to trade the other nations off the boards, but the United States will be slow to act in the future, for we have learned our lesson at Washington and at Geneva.

Mr. Chairman, there is another dangerous organization in this city run by Miss Dorothy Detzer. It is the Women's International League, a socialistic, communistic organization which has sent out much trash against preparedness and which has even gone so far as to prepare the kind of letter that should be sent to Members of Congress by the recipient and her friends. This organization, with its questionable affiliations, is a real menace to the Government.

Mr. Chairman, it is sometimes very hard to discriminate between the foreign propagandist who assumes the rôle of pacifist in order to further the interests of his own country or fatherland to the detriment of the United States and the other well-meaning pacifist who becomes the unwitting tool of the foreign propagandist and who is used as a cat's-paw in furthering the interests of foreign governments.

It does not seem possible that the opinions or advice of such persons should receive serious consideration in opposition to the sound judgment of those who have studied the subject matter before the committee and who have had opportunity to observe the activities of nations from both commercial and military standpoints; and yet that is exactly what does and has happened.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, after going on record practically unanimously for one kind of a naval construction program, after listening for days to the desires of professional propagandists, completely reversed itself and almost unanimously declared for a very much smaller building program.

The committee listened attentively to four trustees of the Church Peace Union, founded by Andrew Carnegie. They were Dr. Linley V. Gordon, Rev. Arthur Judson Brown, Rev. John A. Ryan, and Prof. William I. Hull.

The Church Peace Union trustees are also the trustees for the World Alliance for International Friendship and a number of other organizations with interlocking directorates, and it is pretty hard to tell just how they fit in with each other, but it was evident that most of them were more or less subsidized under the Carnegie fund.

Doctor Brown made a very favorable presentation to the committee; said he was not a pacifist, but generally deplored heavy naval expansion.

Doctor Gordon was opposed to a large naval expansion program and said that his combined organizations would continue to work whole-heartedly for an international agreement for the limitation of naval armaments, but that pending that time he and a great majority of his various associations would continue to favor the spirit of the Washington conference ratio of 5-5-3 in naval armaments for the United States.

Father Ryan was for a Navy adequate for the national defense, but had some trouble defining the word "adequate," as we all do. Father Ryan was, however, for replacing those ships of the Navy that become obsolete.

The fourth trustee of the Church Peace Union to come before the committee was Dr. William I. Hull, professor of history and international relations at Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pa., and it was not long before he had taxed the patience of every member of the committee with his evasive answers, his angel voice, his monumental conceit, and a complete satisfaction with himself. His failure to answer or comprehend the most simple questions discouraged every member of the committee to a point where the chairman, Mr. BUTLER, from whose district Professor Hull comes, gasped in sheer desperation—

Doctor Hull, won't you please try to answer the questions?

Mr. Chairman, although Professor Hull has been teaching students at Swarthmore College for some 31 years, he is such an adamant pacifist that with him the wisdom of the colonists in revolting in 1776 "was a debatable question," while his reference to a well-known expression of Gen. George Washington as "a long-exploded fallacy" brought groans from committee members.

Professor Hull said that the American Navy should be composed of small, inoffensive gunboats like those used on the Great Lakes and that he would not replace those ships as they became obsolete.

And this same Professor Hull has been teaching the youth of this country for 31 years. What a shining advertisement he is for Swarthmore College, an institution of high repute.

Is it any wonder that the New York Herald-Tribune editorially said of him that "his attitdue toward American self-defense is consistent with his general position as a confirmed international anarchist." He would not even admit that the American Revolution was justified. Doctor Hull and his kind do not care how strong other nations are in comparison with ours. Their first concern is to destroy our own naval and military defense. Why should the House committee or any other group of real Americans pay the slightest attention to the clamor of this fantastic and unworthy source against providing the United States with an adequate Navy?

They say, "Do away with your Navy; sink all ships," and then, with outstretched arms to England say, "Now, see what we have done. It is true we have $20,000,000,000 worth of commerce on the high seas, but we are now weak; won't you disarm with us and destroy your navy, too?" In weakness there is strength; that is their cry.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I wonder whether these associations had any effect on the committee when it discarded the President's program for a weaker program.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman came to me the other day in the lobby. I had been told by a very good friend of his and mine—and this is said in all good humor—that he was preparing a speech directed at me as a big-Navy leader and yet having voted for this insignificant bill. When I told him that this bill was a better bill for the national defense than the President's bill he said, "I did not understand it that way; I am glad you told me." I am told he made up his mind not to make the speech.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Oh, no; I did not understand the gentleman's alibi until I heard it. That is what I meant, and that is all. You have no real bill here at all, but you have an alibi to present to the American people. You have a weaker bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the country is interested in a conversation which occurred in the lobby between these two gentlemen. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to answer just one statement in connection with the gentleman's [Mr. LAGUARDIA] reference to my vote on the night that war was declared. I stood on this floor and voted against the declaration of war, and under the same circumstances I would vote the same way again. I apologize to no one for that vote. About a year and a half ago I was suggesting that we follow the President on some proposition, when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], and he said:

I remember the time when the gentleman did not stand by the President.

He was referring to my war vote. Instantly the little gentleman from New York, who is always ready to fight——

Mr. LAGUARDIA (interposing). I was a Member of the House at that time.

Mr. BRITTEN. I know you were. The gentleman was here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I supported the President.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am referring to the colloquy with Mr. WINGO.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I was not ashamed and I am not ashamed of what I did after that. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Nor am I ashamed of what I did before, during, or after the World War. When I had answered the suggestion made by the gentleman from Arkansas and had sat down, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] got the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and turned instantly to the speech I had made at the time war was declared and he said to me, "I have just read your speech made at that time," and he said, "You were entirely right; you were right in your premise." What I did say at that time was not only the line or two read from my speech by the gentleman from New York, but I stated clearly and conclusively at that time that we were unprepared for war. I said our training stations had no boys in them and that many of our ships had skeleton crews on them; that some of them were tied to the docks at Philadelphia because of lack of personnel, and two or three of them had only skeleton crews on them. I said that was no time to declare war; and the results speak for themselves—the terrible sacrifices we made after the declaration of war, but not in money. I do not care about the money end of it. I would not have cared if it had cost us ten thousand billions of dollars; the life of the Nation is priceless. But I was thinking of the boys, the ships not properly manned, and in no shape to go to war. But many pacifists—many of them like the gentleman from New York himself—were willing to declare war and go to war under those awful circumstances. That class of people is made up of men like this man Libby, who goes around the country talking about his country and his flag—the flag for which he refuses to fight. They are the people who keep this country unprepared. They are the great danger to-day, and not the man who wants to build battleships. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], my colleague on the committee, who just preceded me, has had quite a good deal of sport, apparently, out of what he terms the minority report. I have found in my experience in the House that every time there is a question which relates to statistics it always can be counted on that several different kinds of results can be offered. In other words, it is always the ox that has been gored which indicates the viewpoint. Those who follow the Secretary of the Navy and the administration naturally will bring their figures here to prove their viewpoint, and we who try to visualize the condition that exists throughout the world naturally try to present the kind of figures that represent what we believe to be the facts.

Now, I ask the membership of this House what type of ship in the last war was found to be the most disastrous when it came to the destruction of ships. Is there anybody here who is going to say it was other than the submarine? No; because if you did you would not make a statement that could be proven by the record.

The following table shows the amount of world merchant tonnage losses due to German submarines during the World War; also the number of submarines and their displacement tonnage used in this connection.

The greater part of the information that is available was complied by the British, particularly that part relating to the tonnage destroyed before the United States entered the war. From these British sources, from our own, and from whatever other sources available, the following has been compiled by this office. And while it may not be—and perhaps is not—strictly accurate to the last ton, it is the best that we have and is probably a very close approximation.

In regard to the number of German submarines engaged in active service, the most reliable information that is available in this office is that given by Vice Admiral Andreas Michelson, retired, formerly commander German submarine force, in his book The Submarine Warfare, 1914-1918. Admiral Michelson states that Germany entered the war with 20 boats, that the unrestricted campaign was started with 111 boats, and that the greatest number of boats ever available at the front was 140, in October, 1917.

So I want to say to you here that the combined tonnage of the fleet of this Nation is only 2,000,000 tons plus, and the German submarines in three months during the World War sunk a tonnage of ships equal to the combined tonnage of this Nation. In addition, the German submarines sunk, if I am informed correctly, a tonnage that equalled every single navy in the world during the war with Germany.

Submarines are undersea craft, the only kind that can navigate the ocean alone. The type of ship that can operate closest to the harbors of the world. The ships that have proven the greatest menace to commerce. The type that destroyed in 1917, 5,000,000 tons of allied commerce and struck terror to the hearts of the civilized world.

France has authorized 27 of the newest type and has 20 underway; Italy has authorized 20 of the newest type and has 12 underway; Japan has authorized 24 of the newest type and has 14 underway; England has authorized 24 of the newest type and 6 underway; the United States has 6 authorized of the newest type with only 3 completed.

Thus, it can be said, if the members of the Naval Affairs Committee are charged with the responsibility of keeping this Nation properly prepared for any kind of an emergency and war should suddenly come upon us, this Nation would not have the proper equipment to prevent our commerce from being paralyzed, and it would be necessary immediately to authorize an emergency submarine building program which could not be completed until frightful damage had been inflicted by the enemy.

So I am not far wrong in suggesting that what we need in this Nation at this time is not cruisers, but the kind of ship that we will have to have if we should ever be confronted in the future with such a disastrous condition.

Now, getting back to the subject of cruisers, I find upon an investigation of this subject that we have found that destroyers, which are nothing but small cruisers, are the best ships that could be utilized in time of war in order to combat the menace of the submarines, and we built up to 282 of this type of ship. Why? It is faster in the water, it is better from the standpoint of maneuverability and mobility, and it is the kind of ship we had to have to convoy our fleets and to convoy them in such a manner as to keep the submarines from sinking them on the ocean; and we did this during the last war. Therefore, if my statement is correct, then the destroyer is nothing but a small cruiser, and I have figured all of these types of ships, classifying them in groups of from 1,000 to 5,000 tons, 5,000 to 15,000 tons, and so on, measuring, if you please, the tonnage of our ships with the ships of the other nations of the world, and I make the statement, without fear of contradiction, that should this Nation be so unfortunate as to become engaged in a war to-morrow, we would have to have submarines and submarines of the newest type.

Some have said we are going to abandon this type of ship. I wish it could be abandoned. If there is any kind of ship on earth that is detestable in the eyes of humanity, it is the submarine, but just as long as the other nations of the world build and maintain submarines, poison gas, and the other death-dealing devices, this country will have to maintain the same kind of defense and offence. This is the reason I have suggested that submarines of the larger type, having in mind the adopting of safety devices, should be substituted for cruisers.

Whose program is this? Some say it is the President's program. Why did not the President of the United States ask for this program last year? Is it the President's program?

It was very amusing to me when the figures prepared by the Navy called for 71 ships was first presented to the Naval Affairs Committee. Accompanying the same was a statement which said it did not conflict with the President's policy, thereby leaving the impression that the administration was indorsing the same. A little later in a statement quoting Congressman BRITTEN, the ranking member of this committee, the Associated Press said:

> The President said that the program was not a large one and that he hoped it would be accepted by Congress without substantial amendments.

Under date of February 10, the United Press carried a statement to the effect that the Coolidge Navy program, which, according to the figures presented by the Naval Affairs Committee, called for expenditures of more than $4,000,000,000 in nine years, thus leaving the impression that President Coolidge was standing behind this program. Under date of February 29, the Associated Press carried another statement headed, "Coolidge says no jingoism in new Navy plan," and making the specific statement that the President took pains to point out the fact that the 74 ships suggested were a Navy, rather than a White House proposal. Then again under date of March 7, an article referring to Mr. Wilbur's speech at Bay City, Mich., said:

> Mr. Wilbur declared his proposal for construction of 71 war vessels was presented to Congress with the consent of Coolidge.

I hold in my hand these prominently featured write-ups. This program was first attributed to the administration, but the President himself denied the authenticity of the legislation, saying it is not his, but it belongs to the Navy. Therefore this child comes in here without the proper parents. The commanding chief, the leader of the Nation, the superior officer of the country, disowns the same; it is illegitimate, and the legislation should not be passed in its present form.

I want this Nation to have the very best equipment that is possible. I want this Congress to appropriate the necessary amount of money to give this Nation everything that is needed.

Now, what about the cruiser strength of Great Britain? Out of the 47 cruisers of Great Britain, 36 of them, I believe, are less than 5,000 tons and 10 of them are less than 4,000 tons. In other words, they are little, tiny ships that can be called destroyers. They are in the same class, only a little larger, than our 282 destroyers; and when you make a proper compilation, figuring on the basis of speed, you will find we do not have a less amount of tonnage in this class of ships than Great Britain. And what if we did? It would not make any difference.

Great Britain does not depend upon cruisers for a certain type of defense; and yesterday I made certain statements along this line, and I read excerpts from statements of the British Admiralty and of certain British officers which showed they would not care if we had 100 cruisers or more; but I want to say to this House and to this Congress that if we should start in to build 50 or 60 submarines, it would be the subject of a colloquy immediately, and in my opinion it would bring about those things which would make it necessary to have a disarmament conference.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCLINTIC. In just a moment.

In respect of the statement made about battleships, everybody knows that a battleship can be destroyed by one bomb, because they have been so destroyed. Everybody knows that a battleship is too slow, it is too vulnerable to attack, and as they stand they are not suitable in any modern war. In the last war most of our battleships were parked up one of our rivers until after the war was over. We have seven hundred and twenty-odd million dollars invested in these battleships. I say we ought to protect this investment, and the only way I can figure to protect the investment is to spend an additional $1,000,000 on each for the construction of a platform sufficiently large to take care of big bombing planes.

Bombing planes are not carried on any type of ship at the present time except airplane carriers, and by the construction of a platform up above the turrets it would be possible for these large planes to be launched with catapults into the air, thereby enabling them to fight at a distance of approximately 200 miles, and if successful they would sink the enemy before they could reach the battleship with gunfire.

In other words, I say, after making the investigation of this subject, after having figured for hours with certain persons I consider well qualified and who agree with me that it can be done, and I would rather take their advice than the advice of any gentleman on the committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman give the names of the naval officers in the Navy that say it can be done?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will give the names to the gentleman privately but not on the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Were they naval constructors?

Mr. McCLINTIC. It was an officer who knows more about aircraft than the gentleman or I do.

Mr. BUTLER. He would not have to know much to know more than I do.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am informed that it can be done, and I am advised that we can do it without violating any treaty agreement, and I am informed that it will enable us to carry 10 or 12 big bombing planes, thereby making the battleship a valuable part of the Navy, when otherwise it must go into the obsolete class. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. That sounds to me like the flapping of a window blind.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of some one. We Members who are not on the committee would like some information, and when gentlemen on the committee are asked to yield they refuse.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I will yield a half minute to the gentleman from North Carolina to ask a question.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I will say to the gentleman that this is a very serious matter; a very serious controversy is going on in the country at large. I understand the gentleman is in opposition to the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. McCLINTIC. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The original program was for $720,000,000 at first?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Seven hundred and forty million dollars.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And now it is reduced to $274,000,000?

Mr. McCLINTIC. It was put as high as possible at first in order to get what they really wanted.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The reduction of the program is in response to the great agitation in the country and the feeling that we ought not to go so strong?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is the gentleman in favor of it?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am offering a proposition to reduce the appropriation to $100,000,000, which will give us five times the efficiency proposed by this program.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is the gentleman in favor of this if he can not get the one he proposes?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No. This program is not needed.

Mr. ABERNETHY. How much does the gentleman think is needed?

Mr. McCLINTIC. One hundred million dollars; and that will give us more protection—give us 18 aircraft carriers and enable us to stand off every other nation of the world.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Then the gentleman is in favor of a building program, but not as much as is proposed here?

Mr. McCLINTIC. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, there has been so much heat generated here that I think we ought to drop the naval bill and take up the Army bill. My time is so short that I ask not to be interrupted.

For the purpose of a starter I am going to classify the citizens of the United States into three groups. One is very small in numbers, who believe that this country is in danger of imminent war and who would have Congress appropriate more money for the defense of the country than has been proposed in the original bill. I do not agree with that class of people. On the other hand, there is a class of people in this country who do not want to appropriate any money whatever for the protection of our country, a group of people who believe, and they are honest in their intentions, that we have reached that delightful time in the history of this country when, in the language of Holy Writ, we can beat our swords into ploughshares and the nations shall learn war no more, that we have come to that time—

When navies are forgotten,
  And fleets are useless things,
When the dove shall warm her bosom
  Underneath the eagle's wings;
When the memory of battles
  Is at last strange and old,
When nations have found one banner
  And creeds have found one fold;
When the Hand that sprinkles midnight
  With its powdered drifts of suns
Has hushed this tiny tumult
  Of swords and sects and guns;
When hate's last note of discord
  In all this world shall cease,
In the conquest which is service,
  In the victory which is peace.

I do not agree with them. I think we have people in all walks of life, in all communities in the United States, who are quite well intentioned, but who are so much on one extreme of the other that they are never known to occupy a safe, sane, conservative course, unless they meet themselves at right angles while they are going from one extreme to another. But there is a third group, to which I belong.

I believe that this group makes up the great bulk of the American people, who believe that it is the duty of this Government, recognizing the history of this Nation, how it was purchased and how this Government was set up and how our liberties which we are enjoying to-day have been transmitted to us, to carry out the mandates of the Constitution and to maintain a Navy and to insure the peace and the protection of this great Republic of ours, the greatest that ever gleamed like a priceless jewel upon the skeleton hands of time, the greatest Nation that ever rose to bless the hopes or animate the aspirations of mankind.

I think these first two classes that I have mentioned got in their work when the Naval Affairs Committee first met to consider the naval program. It was amusing to me when this Congress convened and when the program came from the President of the United States and the Navy Department, which was formulated by the General Board asking the Naval Affairs Committee to consider a bill to authorize the construction of 25 cruisers, 9 destroyer leaders, 5 aircraft carriers, and 32 submarines, to see one of these elements get into action. Some of the newspapers of the country were flooded with editorials, one after another, stating that it was a great building program, the greatest in the world, and that the United States Government was going to enter into a competition in the building of naval armament.

I am not going to discuss that original program because it is not before this House, and it will not be before this House at this session of Congress; but I do say, in passing, that inasmuch as that program did not exceed the limits as adopted and agreed upon by the Washington conference, I fail to catch the logic of anyone who says that even if they had engaged on that building program it would have been a race for a competitive armament. The newspapers talked on that side, and when the Naval Affairs Committee brought in the bill that we are now considering for the construction of 15 cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier the other element that I mentioned said that the committee and the Congress had surrendered to the pacificists of this country. I have a clipping here that I shall not take the time to read, by Mr. Frederic William Wile. I think his name is quite correct, because if he is not wild in his statements he is wild in his conclusions. I am reminded of a story they tell in Texas of a white man who was driving along with a yoke of oxen. A negro boy was sitting on the wagon beside him. It was very hot, and finally one of the oxen laid down. The white man told the colored boy to get out and twist the oxen's tail. The boy got down and commenced to twist the ox's tail. It was very hot. The sun was streaming down out of a cloudless sky, and the perspiration was running down the boy's face. He kept twisting and twisting. Finally he looked up at the white man and said, "Boss, this steer's tail has been twisted so much that it does not inconvenience him a damn bit." [Laughter.] And so it is in public life, my friends. A man has got to take the gaff, and in public or private life the best rule for any man to follow is to use his own judgment and let his conscience be his guide and let people say what they please. [Applause.]

I have listened attentively to the debate on this bill. There is nothing complex or intricate about it. It was thoroughly discussed by three or four Members here on Tuesday last, when the bill was first taken up for consideration.

Their speeches are printed in the RECORD. If there is anybody who is honestly seeking light about this building program, he can get it from those printed speeches and from the minority and the majority reports. I sometimes think that a lot of people who seem to be seeking information do not want it. They seem to be like the swamp owl, the more light you turn on them the blinder they get. My friend Mr. McCLINTIC—and I want to say in referring to him that he is my friend, and that I have the highest regard for him, and I believe he is honorable and patriotic—is trying to accomplish just what the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs is trying to accomplish. We all want such a Navy as will insure the peace and protection of this country. The trouble about it is that he is looking at it one way and we are looking at it in another. Truth is a many-faced diamond, and no man can get all the rays that come from it. All of the rays that we can get are those which come within our range. You remember the story of the three blind men who were asked to describe the elephant, and this applies to men who are normal as we are. They examined the elephant, and one of them got hold of his tail. He said the elephant is like a rope. Another blind man happened to run up against the side of the elephant. He said that the elephant is like a house. The third man got hold of the elephant's ear, and he said that the elephant is like a water lily. You see, therefore, that it all depends upon the viewpoint and the information that we get and our reasoning about matters. I am not going into details concerning a comparison with other nations. Other men have done that. There are two or three things I want to notice. First, my good friend McCLINTIC made the statement the other day—and he makes it in this minority report—that farm relief and flood control legislation ought to be considered before this bill. I agree with that statement, but I have been a Member of Congress long enough to know that one man here can not have his own way and that one man can not control the situation.

Farm-relief and flood-control legislation are two of the most important matters demanding the attention of this Congress and demanding solution, and for one I will never vote to adjourn this session of Congress until both of those subjects have been dealt with, and I hope both of them will be enacted into law. I say this because they are important and I would like to see them considered first.

Yet this is an important bill, because the Constitution of the United States places upon us the duty and responsibility of maintaining a Navy. My good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] made a further statement. I agree with him on these statements more than I controvert him, but not on this proposition. He said in his speech here that if some stranger were to listen to some of the arguments proposed here he would think we were at war with Great Britain at this time and that the British were approaching here as they did in the War of 1812.

I have heard no such inflammatory statement. In fact, I have not heard anyone express the view that we are facing any trouble with Great Britain. I did hear one gentleman say in his speech here on Tuesday that war with Great Britain is unthinkable.

However, I am glad that the gentleman from Oklahoma mentioned the War of 1812, because that ought to make every man a supporter of an adequate Navy.

Prior to the War of 1812, if the Congress of the United States had been true to the trust reposed in it and had made proper provision for our Navy, that part of our history would not have been written. In 1824 President James Monroe in speaking of the War of 1812 said:

> In the late war our whole coast was either invaded or menaced with invasion. There was scarcely a harbor or city on any of our great inlets which could be considered secure. In whatever direction the enemy chose to move with their squadrons and to land their troops our fortifications, where any existed, presented but little obstacle to them.

Now I want you to listen to this, because I believe in my heart that it is the correct doctrine. President Monroe further stated:

> Two great objects are therefore to be regarded in the establishment of an adequate naval force: The first to prevent war, so far as may be practicable; the second to diminish its calamities whenever it may be inevitable. No government will be disposed to violate our rights if it knows we have the means to defend them.

That is just as true now, to-day, as it was then. President Roosevelt in a message said of the Navy:

> So far from being in any way a provocation of war, an adequate and highly trained navy is the best guaranty against war, the cheapest and most effective peace insurance. Probably no other great nation in the world is so anxious for peace as we are. There is not a civilized power which has anything whatever to fear from aggression on our part.

That statement is as true now as it was when President Roosevelt uttered it. The nations of this earth know that there is not now any intention of aggressiveness on our part.

In 1914 President Wilson said:

> We shall take leave to be strong upon the seas, in the future as in the past; and there will be no thought of offense or of provocation on our part.

While he was President Mr. Harding made this statement:

> We owe it to ourselves to understand that the Navy is rather more than a mere instrumentality of warfare. It is the right arm of the Department of State, seeing to the enforcement of its righteous pronouncements.

On the 23d of December, 1923, President Coolidge said:

> For several years we have been decreasing the personnel of the Army and Navy and reducing their power to the danger point. The Army is a guaranty of the security of our citizens at home; the Navy is a guaranty of the citizens abroad. Both of these services should be strengthened rather than weakened.

In other words, President Coolidge wanted a Navy that "would not choose to run." He wanted a Navy that was strong. That has been the attitude of every President of the United States.

My friends, we have been caught napping a time or two, and if this country should suddenly be thrown into a war of any kind we would be in the position here that was occupied by the Army of the Potomac during the Civil War. During the war, as you know, the mail facilities were not what they are at the present time and frequently it would be weeks or months before the people would get the newspapers. On one occasion an old postmaster in a village post office was reading to the assembled patrons of the office from a stale newspaper, and finally he read, "The Army of the Potomac stands in statu quo." A boy in the rear on the outskirts of the crowd rose up and said, "Mr. Postmaster, what does that mean—'stands in statu quo'?" Of course he did not know, but he replied, "My young friend, it has been a long time since I studied Latin, but as near as I make this out it simply means "that the Army of the Potomac is in a hell of a fix." [Laughter.] That is the position this country would be in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I want to call your attention to another thing. I have already mentioned our condition in the War of 1812. We were not in a condition of preparedness when the World War came on. I have the figures here to show that. Let me give you the figures briefly:

> At the outbreak of the World War, as at all other times, the adequacy or otherwise of the United States Navy had to be determined by its relative strength, having in view the tasks which it might be called upon to perform.
>
> At the beginning of the World War no one could predict what action would be required on the part of the Navy of the United States. We might ultimately find ourselves at war, requiring independent action or action in support of other powers. Diplomatic questions arose during the first two years of the World War involving decisions as to serious interference with our commerce on the high seas, interference in a manner not previously contemplated by the practice of belligerents.
>
> The following is a statement of the naval strength in types, already built, of the three principal naval powers of the world at that time:

	Battleships (dreadnought type)	Battleships (predreadnought type)	Battle cruisers	Armored cruisers	Cruisers	Destroyers	Submarines
Great Britain	423,450	589,385	188,200	406,800	382,815	125,850	33,062
Germany	285,770	242,800	110,177	94,245	150,747	67,094	14,140
United States	180,650	309,282	0	140,080	75,625	35,068	9,220

There were building on July 1, 1914, the following vessels:

	Battleships (dreadnought type)	Battleships (predreadnought type)	Battle cruisers	Armored cruisers	Cruisers	Destroyers	Submarines
Great Britain	421,000		28,500		67,000	21,770	17,236
Germany	187,052		110,175		26,900	14,400	14,400
United States	117,800		0		75,625	11,926	10,139

Summarizing all of the above figures and including with them other minor classes of ships, the following were the naval tonnages of the several powers built and building on July 1, 1914:

Great Britain	2,713,756
Germany	1,304,640
United States	914,218

It will be noted from the above that at the outbreak of the World War the United States was a poor third in naval strength; that her total tonnage built and building was only one-third that of Great Britain and only a little over two-thirds that of Germany. This marked inadequacy of the American Navy led to building programs during the next few years on the part of the United States Navy as follows:

Battleships	10
Battle cruisers	6
Destroyers	248
Submarines	94
Eagle boats	60
Submarine chasers	441

And a considerable number of naval auxiliary vessels. The larger part of all of the above program was to supply deficiencies in the Navy required to make it adequate to meet the then world situation.

The smaller classes of vessels were specifically appropriated for to meet the needs of the United States Navy in a war to which it became party, and is in itself an indication of the degree to which the Navy of the United States was not adequate at the outbreak of the World War.

The number of American ships used for transportation of troops, and number of troops transported on American ships during the World War, and information regarding British or other allied ships used for transportation of Army troops to Europe were as follows:

The number of American troops transported in American vessels to Europe during the World War	898,449
The number of American troops transported to Europe in foreign vessels was	1,157,673
The number of sailings of American ships used for transportation of troops to Europe during the World War in 1917 and 1918 was	388
Sailings of British ships	546
Sailings of other foreign ships	82

If we are to draw any lesson now from the past, as Patrick Henry said, that is the safest way by which our feet can be guided; I say, my friends, we should always keep ourselves adequately and reasonably prepared to protect our own interests.

Instead of authorizing 25 cruisers, as we were requested, we authorized 15 to be laid down in three equal groups during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, 1930, and 1931. Instead of 5 aircraft carriers as requested we provide for 1. We did not authorize the 32 submarines nor the 9 destroyer leaders which were requested. Instead of presenting you with a program of $740,000,000, we submit a program which calls for $274,000,000, to be spent during the six-year period, and if the testimony which has been produced before our committee is to be believed this is essential to meet the urgent demands of our fleet.

The life of a cruiser is 15 years average and of a submarine is 13 years.

Of our present cruisers, there are 22 with an age of 24 years or greater still retained in service. Not a single cruiser was built between 1908 and 1922 by the United States, but in those years Great Britain built 44 cruisers, to which have been added in 1924 to 1927, inclusive, 5 more, making a total of 49 cruisers, with a tonnage of 246,776 tons, while in the years 1923 to 1925 we built 10 cruisers, with a total of 66,000 tonnage—our present total cruiser Navy not obsolete.

Now, we have in blue prints plans for 8 cruisers, authorized, with 80,000 tonnage; 2 were laid down by the United States in 1926, and are perhaps one-third advanced in construction, for it takes three to four years to build either a cruiser, a submarine, or a destroyer. None have been begun by us since 1926, while Great Britain has laid down 14 cruisers since 1924.

Japan, whose naval force was to be three-fifths of that of the United States or Great Britain, has built, since 1910, 25 cruisers with an aggregate tonnage of 126,415, and has now laid down 8 more with a tonnage of 80,000. Of these, 21 date since 1919 and 14 date since the Washington disarmament conference.

The agreement at the Washington disarmament conference omitted cruiser limits—against the American protest—but the spirit of the limitation was to keep cruisers down to normal proportions of capital ships which were specifically limited to a 5–5–3 ratio for the three nations.

These statistics are vital to an understanding of the showing that it is not America which is leading any competitive race in strong navies, for we are trailing away behind both Great Britain and Japan. All of our 24 to 20 year old cruisers are obsolete and should be scrapped; they include three which antedate the Spanish war. The total tonnage of our nonobsolete cruisers is only 66,000.

Modern cruisers have a speed of 34 knots; our obsolete vessels, all built before 1909, range in speed from 16 to 22 knots, except four, which are rated less than 26 knots. None of these could come within many miles of an enemy cruiser, while all the British cruisers exceed 25 knots, and most of them are from 29 knots up to 33 or faster. Great Britain has no obsolete vessels, according to British authority, but has a cruiser force four times as strong as that of the United States, and Japan's cruiser force is nearly double that of America. Admiral Hughes testified before the Naval Affairs Committee that we ought to have 28 cruisers, 15 of which to be used in such work as guarding the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the naval base at Hawaii, the Panama Canal, and for guarding our commerce. If this be true, as contended by experts, that 5 cruisers are required for every 3 capital ships, then we should have more cruisers than called for in this bill, as we have 18 battleships in our fleet, which would require 30 cruisers, and this would leave us 3 short of Japan, which has 33.

Any naval policy which we adopt should be with a view of the national security of the United States. We boast of the United States being independent, and yet in the book Dependent America, written by ex-Secretary of Commerce Redfield, is listed more than 24 different kinds of materials essential for a "defensive" warfare that must come from other countries than the United States. This means, then, that it is essential to keep open our sea lanes, for the Army could not always defend the country if the Navy should fail. In 1926 the food imports into the United States, according to the Department of Commerce, reached $1,160,000,000. Our exports of food during that period of time amounted to $894,000,000, and this showed a shortage against us of $266,000,000. This but emphasizes the fact that the agricultural legislation which I have always advocated should be given to this country.

For more than 100 years our country has maintained our right as a nation to trade with any nation of earth, regardless of whether that nation is at war or not. If it is to be the purpose of this Government to continue that policy, then it is impossible, in view of the chaotic conditions of other countries, for us to tell when we may be drawn into a war. We were drawn in by Germany unexpectedly and against our will. My belief is that if we had been equipped with an adequate Navy at that time that we would not have had to participate in that war. I fail to find in the history of our glorious Republic where we have ever become involved in a war on account of our having an adequate Navy or on account of naval aggression on our part. But we have suffered more than one time for the want of a Navy.

The United States has proven that it wants no naval race. When the Washington conference was called in 1922 the people applauded the motive, but now almost universally regret that the United States sent approximately $300,000,000 to the bottom of the sea in scrapped ships. When the Geneva conference was on last year, Great Britain laid her cards on the table and stated the number and kind of ships she required, regardless of other nations. As much as I would like to see a limitation of naval armaments by the nations of the earth, I concede Great Britain's right to take such action. I do not blame any nation from taking such steps as it may deem necessary for its own necessities, and I think our Government should do likewise. Many reasons have been assigned for the failure of the Geneva conference. Each person has the right to draw his own conclusions, but A. G. Gardiner, an Englishman, writing for an English paper [John Bull], says that that conference broke down for three reasons: First, the hostility of the Admiralty to disarmament; second, the failure of the British Government to support him; and, third, the declaration of Mr. Churchill that he would not commit himself to a policy of naval equality with America. If that is true, the blame can not be laid at the door of our Government. And since that conference has failed, it seems to me that we would be recreant to our duty if we do not now authorize the construction of such ships as we urgently need. And in this program which we are now submitting to Congress we are keeping faith with the contention of our representatives at the Geneva conference.

Our needs do not depend upon the needs of other nations. We have a long coast line, the Panama Canal, and our island possessions. If war was on now, the protection of our shipping would be sadly insufficient. We would be at the mercy of the enemy. If the 15 cruisers called for in this bill are built, we will then be short of a parity with Great Britain by 89,000 tons, which is the equivalent to about 9 cruisers. If these 15 cruisers are built, the United States will have, when they are completed, only 33 modern cruisers. This is 10 less than stated as the minimum by the Naval General Board. Our fleet should be sufficient to act as our first line of defense. The welfare of nations, as of individuals, requires definite planning.

This is a modest program that has been sifted down by the Naval Affairs Committee. It seems to me anybody could support this program because, as I stated a few minutes ago, I believe it represents the heart and wish of the great bulk of the great American people who believe this country ought to be protected, and that it is the duty of Congress to measure up to its constitutional requirements and give them ample protection, and we must have a definite plan.

As you know, the record shows it takes from three to four years to build a cruiser, and it is our duty to commence it now. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair advise me how much time I have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has 57 minutes remaining.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN]. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there has been a wonderful turnover here lately about this naval business. At the last session of Congress we had a drag-down and pull-out fight here to support the President on the proposition of not building some cruisers, and I followed the President. This year we are asked to appropriate $274,000,000 for a big naval program.

I would like to say in parenthesis to what I have to say that I can not understand why there are so many belligerent people in the House over an imaginary fight and there are so many pacifists here when it comes to dealing with a real matter—the Mississippi River and its tributaries. [Applause.]

Let us see what the public abroad thinks about it. The gentleman has referred to the editor of the New York Times. I do not know whether he is an Englishman or not, but he is talking some real sense to the American people even though he were born in England. I will say that for him. The Baltimore Sun does not need any defense at my hands. Everybody knows it is one of the high-class papers of the country, and its politics is right as well. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, gentlemen, let us see about this matter. Here is what a member of Parliament said in the House of Commons:

> You can not expect these naval experts, whether they are of high rank or of more modest rank, to do otherwise than use every effort they can to obtain more ships, more money, more dock yards, more seamen, bigger guns, larger equipment, and they would not be really worthy of their position unless they did.
>
> The cruisers are practically useless against submarines. You can build as many 10,000-ton cruisers as you like, costing from $10,000,000 to $12,500,000 each, and they will be useless against submarines. We can not afford, and we will not be able to afford in the lifetime of any of us, a navy that can make us absolutely secure at sea.
> We ought to meet the Americans half way—in this matter. The Americans are demanding that when they are neutral they shall be able to trade with any nation, whether that nation is at war or peace. That is a doctrine which the Americans have maintained for 100 years, namely, that a neutral flag should cover neutral goods. That matter should be fully explored in a serious way.
>
> Did the First Lord ever ask the American representatives at Geneva if they were prepared, on the condition that we cut down our cruiser program, to guarantee our commerce from unprovoked attack at sea? I suggest that course as the most fruitful line of approach to a difficult problem.
>
> I think that another conference must be called. The lines of disagreement were so finely drawn last autumn at Geneva that there is no excuse for not calling another conference and the initiative should come from our good friends, the Japanese.
>
> I frankly admit that I have been converted to the idea of the outlawry of war. All warfare must be outlawed, and I believe it can be done if we come to an agreement with the American people. I am certain that an agreement can be come to in spite of the die-hards on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to yield if I could get more time. I am sorry, but I can not. The gentleman from Illinois says that everybody who is opposed to a big naval program is a pacifist. Well, do you know what a pacifist is in this country? He is the fellow who has to do the fighting after the swashbucklers get us into war. That is what a pacifist is. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Texas spoke about the Capitol being burned during the War of 1812. If the gentleman had read his history a little further, he would have found how it came to be burned. There were here many of these fellows who wanted us to enter the war, those who were always fighting in the papers and writing about it. They were all around Washington, and then when the British landed they had to go and fight, they hurried out to Bladensburg and met the redcoats, but they could not stand the gaff. They ran away and let the so-called pacifists do the fighting at the Thames and New Orleans. [Applause.]

Our good friend says the Christian people oppose this program, and he says his side could not find many who wanted to talk against this naval bill. But let me tell the gentleman that if you vote for this big naval program you will not have anybody here asking for time in the next Congress. I will tell you that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. McKEOWN. My time is limited, and I hope the gentleman will excuse me.

Let me tell you something. I am serious about this matter. We are asked to vote for $274,000,000 to build a big Navy. For what? Well, we want to keep up the style. That is all. Do you know what a disarmament conference is? Well, it is a conference of nations where is set the armament style. They all want to sit in at the setting of the style, and who is it that sits in? Why, Mr. Armor-plate Manufacturer sits in. Do not doubt that he does not sit in. He is interested and he is around there, and he is not going to let them set a style that will put the armor-plate manufacturers out of business.

I will show you how they worked the Washington conference. What did they agree to sink? They agreed to sink our good, fine new ships, because they knew that if they let them stay in they would not have a chance to build any more ships for a long time. They agreed to sink all of our fine ships, and the roar of the water is hardly quiet since the great $30,000,000 battleship went to the bottom of the sea before they are here again asking $274,000,000 with which to build more ships.

Gentlemen, the American people may be in favor of this, but I do not believe they are. When we talk about the honest, God-fearing people of this country, we are talking about the salt of the earth, and they are for peace. The gentleman mentions the women of this country. Why should not the women of this country have something to say about the policy of this Government on the question of war? They bear the men who bear the arms to defend this country, and of all the people of this country they have the greatest right to say whether or not we are going to have war.

What is there to all this talk of war? Every time they want a lot of money for the Navy they come up here and scare us almost to death about something going to happen. There is always something going to happen somewhere in the future.

I will tell you about something that did happen in this country, and that is the worst flood ever recorded in the history of this country. Floods have occurred in this region ever since the earliest days of which we have any historical record. Fifteen hundred and forty-six was the year of the first great flood we have any record of in the Mississippi Valley, and now they ask us to come in here and appropriate $274,000,000 for increasing the Navy, and they bring it in here ahead of a bill to fight a real enemy, and you men who live out on the Mississippi River or on its tributaries, who have seen its destruction, how are you going to answer your people when you go back home and say, "I voted for the naval program; I voted for defense against something, but I do not know whether it is going to happen or not, but the gentleman from Illinois said it was going to happen and therefore I voted for it before I had a chance to vote for flood control." These gentlemen will doubtless refuse to vote to protect the lives and the property of your own people. Down in the great valley of the Mississippi River there is a menace and there is a danger. Oh, they talk about defense. Of course we are for defense. Then why not start at home and defend the lives and the property of our people here and then it would be time to talk about the proposition of a naval program.

Gentlemen, I want to tell you something. The world is tired of war, and I would have no apology to make to any man for taking such a position in this intelligent day and intelligent time. I have contended at all times that when men have reached the highest state of civilization, it is absolutely senseless to say they can not settle their disputes except by fighting. Personally, it has been a hard matter for me to keep myself under control. I come from a race of people that have not only fought for themselves and fought themselves but have fought for everybody else in the world. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two more minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Now, gentlemen, what is this naval program for? To defend our country? They are going to defend our country, and I am not here believing we ought to leave ourselves entirely defenseless. I take it the Navy is the first arm of defense in great stress and during great emergency, and it has got to be adequate and sufficient to meet the needs; but when the world is looking to America to set the pace for peace, why should America, with its great wealth and its great resources, when the other nations are looking to us for peace, set up a program of going forward and building great armaments in preparation for war?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman think the other nations were showing any indication of standing for peace when they started their program after the disarmament conference, when Japan started building 116 warships and Great Britain 57?

Mr. McKEOWN. Let me tell the gentleman something. The gentleman said the right thing a while ago when he suggested we ought to have a merchant marine. We can take $85,000,000 of this money and by lending it to a shipbuilding concern we can build six ships that will go from wharf to wharf between New York and London in four days and carry in case of the emergency of war 100 airplanes on the deck and be subject to use by the Government in time of emergency. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the House is greatly favored to-day. The consideration of this bill proceeds under circumstances which, so far as my experience in the House goes, is unprecedented.

It seems certain that to-day must be a holiday of the Navy Department. We are honored to have sitting among the Members on the front bench in the House the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Wilbur, who is availing himself of the privilege which is accorded by our rules to Cabinet members. In the gallery we have the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Robinson. We also have the Judge Advocate and numerous other officers of the Navy looking down upon us—of course, I use that expression only in the literal sense. [Laughter.]

I have been a Member of the House for nearly 14 years, and during that time many measures of importance have been discussed here. In many of these measures Cabinet members have been greatly interested. But this is the first occasion within my knowledge when a member of Cabinet who was greatly interested in the bill, who, indeed, is the father of the bill so far as it has any legitimate paternity, and who is pushing the bill in every way—this is the first occasion when a member of the Cabinet has sat in the House while such a bill was being actually debated.

There are those who for good reasons advocate the British system, under which members of the government sit alongside of members of the House of Commons, they being themselves required to be members, and are interrogated and are expected to give the House of Commons the benefit of their knowledge of the subject under discussion. We have those who favor that system for the United States. Possibly it may be a good system. Possibly what we are experiencing here to-day is the forerunner of that time when not only will members of Cabinet and their assistants and officers of the departments be permitted, by personal contacts on the floor, to use their influence in behalf of measures which they are trying to push through Congress, but will also be expected to contribute something of wisdom as well as of pulchritude.

May I say that if we are to adopt the British system we would have the privilege of interrogation, that would, at least, be some offset to the influence that the presence of an important officer of the Government exerts when he is here with us.

But to be perfectly frank, I feel that the House of Representatives is capable of dealing with questions before it without the assistance on such occasions of department officials. [Applause.] The Secretary of the Navy is establishing a precedent. May I say to him he is doing so over my protest and in what in my opinion is exceedingly poor taste? [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in answer to the last gentleman who just spoke, the rules of this House provide specifically that any Cabinet officer has the privileges of the floor. Now, I am not a special admirer of the Secretary of the Navy, but I think it comes with poor taste from a Member of Congress in criticizing a Cabinet officer when he comes on the floor of the House. I do not know of anybody else who is more interested in this matter than the Secretary of the Navy. [Applause.]

The last time we had this matter before the House I followed the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Senator BURTON, and followed the President against the building program for the Navy. I did it because I had supposed we could do something at Geneva. I want to say in this connection that North Carolina, which I have the honor in part to represent, is very proud of the fact that the President of the United States selected that great Admiral Long as a member of the Geneva conference.

Now, I for one do not think that we should go into an extensive building program here to the exclusion of flood control or agricultural relief. I was with Mr. McKEOWN in the fight when we originally made it, but the situation is now changed. Countries like Great Britain and Japan and other countries are going ahead with a large building program. We find there can not be any agreement at Geneva, and I for one as a red-blooded American citizen am willing to say to the balance of the world if you will not agree we can build as big a Navy as you. [Applause.] We might as well have an understanding as to that with the balance of the world. I do not understand that we have to build $274,000,000 worth of ships—the President of the United States at any moment can stop the building of the ships.

Mr. HUDSON. Oh, no; he can not stop it except by a national agreement.

Mr. ABERNETHY. We have a six-year program, but we might as well let foreign countries understand that if they will not agree to stop war we intend to have as big a navy as they have. I am in favor of peace, I am against war. I sympathize with the agitation going over the country, and the various Members of Congress have been flooded with propaganda, and it is proper propaganda that has been felt here and my old friend from Philadelphia, the Quaker, who does not believe in war unless it is necessary——

Mr. BUTLER. I do not live in Philadelphia, and I am not a Quaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BUTLER. But I esteem the gentleman from North Carolina highly. [Applause.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. I will have to admit my mistake. I had always supposed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a Quaker, although I could not understand how he could be the head of the Naval Affairs Committee and be a Quaker.

Mr. BUTLER. My family belongs to the Society of Friends, and if it saw fit, I am told, could put up six gold stars, and they are not ashamed of the record.

Mr. ABERNETHY. At least the gentleman comes from a Quaker settlement?

Mr. BUTLER. I do.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I think we can give the committee credit when the Secretary of the Navy Department, whether he had the full sanction of the President or not, asked Congress to vote nearly $800,000,000, the committee in response to the public feeling have cut it down to $274,000,000.

I think the House can well follow the committee and say to the balance of the world, If you are not willing to enter into an agreement to outlaw war, if you are not willing to enter into the agreement at Geneva, we are willing to arm this country with sufficient power in the Navy and in arms to defend itself properly.

I want to say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I am for adequate flood control, 100 per cent paid by the Government. I am for a large merchant marine not only to build up our commerce but as an auxiliary to the Navy.

But until we can get an agreement with foreign countries it is necessary to empower the executive branch of our Government with sufficient national defense adequately to protect our country.

Now, I would like to see the Naval Affairs Committee or the Military Affairs Committee recommend to Congress authorizations for sufficient aircraft. I think adequate aircraft is very necessary. [Applause.] Of course, you know the gentleman from Oklahoma lives rather far from the ocean. I think they should have some airplanes to look out for Oklahoma.

But we folks on the seacoast are within reach of some of these long-range guns, and we do not want to be absolutely defenseless.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am glad the gentleman made that statement. I am proposing a plan whereby we can keep the enemy 200 miles away, by increasing our aircraft.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I agree with you about that, and until the failure of this Geneva conference I was with Mr. McKEOWN and other Members of Congress here in the idea that we should not build ships for the purpose of going out into the ocean and sinking them, and I for one, as an humble Member of Congress here, desire to serve notice on you, Mr. Secretary, that if you go out and sink any of these ships that we authorize you to build now you need not expect me to vote to build you any more.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise because I do not wish to let go unchallenged the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. Our rules provide that members of the Cabinet shall have the privilege of the floor, and these rules are a standing invitation for them to come here. Personally I think it is a great pity that they do not avail themselves of the invitation and come here more often. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Not now. They are public officials just the same as we are and they are interested in the public welfare just as much as we are. If it were a case where they come here to urge something of their own, something in which they are financially or selfishly interested, that would be an entirely different matter; but such is not the case in this instance.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Has the gentleman ever known of an instance such as we are having here to-day?

Mr. TILSON. I do not at the moment recall whether I have seen Cabinet officers on the floor when bills affecting their departments are being considered, but that makes no difference whatever. I hope that members of the Cabinet may feel that at any time they are welcome on this floor, and when more fittingly than when matters concerning which they are charged with grave responsibility for the public interests are being discussed? I think that they might often hear things for their benefit and for the benefit of the public service if they were present frequently. Who is there more deeply or patriotically interested in the bill now being considered than the Secretary of the Navy? We often have the galleries filled with people who are here in their own selfish interests at times when bills in which they are financially or otherwise beneficially interested are being considered.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; farmers and everybody else.

Mr. TILSON. And nothing is said about them from the floor; but because certain officials of the Navy Department are in the galleries to-day to hear this debate, then, forsooth, the gentleman from Alabama feels it to be incumbent upon him to criticize them from this floor! After all, what is the difference between hearing the debate from the gallery and reading it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow morning?

Mr. HUDSON. Does not the gentleman remember that Secretary Taft very often was on the floor of this House?

Mr. BUTLER. And Secretary Daniels.

Mr. TILSON. I was not a Member when Mr. Taft was Secretary of War; but I am quite sure that ample precedent will be found, and, at any rate, our rules provide that Cabinet officers shall have the privilege of the floor; so I am glad that one Secretary at least has seen fit to come on the floor of the House during a discussion. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, the gentleman knows that in his time and mine Secretary Josephus Daniels was on this floor a number of times, and Secretary Davis was on the floor a number of times.

Mr. BUTLER. And they were welcome here.

Mr. TILSON. I am glad they were here. They are public officials and are interested in these matters as public officials just the same as we are interested.

Mr. BUTLER. I have walked in here with Secretary Daniels many times.

Mr. TILSON. I can not see any impropriety in it whatsoever. Of course, if it were a matter relating to their own private interests and they should avail themselves of the privilege in order to advance a private interest, it would be different; but this is not such a case. It is a public matter, and who is more properly interested in it as a public matter than the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Against the gentleman's judgment that there is no impropriety in it, may I set up the unbroken custom of preceding secretaries of the departments who have refrained from coming here when bills in which they were interested in were under consideration, because they felt it was indelicate to appear to be trying to influence Congress.

Mr. TILSON. But the gentleman is mistaken, if the word of our much-beloved friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] and others is to be taken. The Secretary of the Navy in no way breaks a precedent in coming here, for we have just been told that one of his distinguished predecessors as Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Josephus Daniels, came on the floor many times.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is it not a fact that the rules permit Cabinet officers to come on the floor, and is not that just the same as if an invitation were extended to them?

Mr. TILSON. I so stated in my remarks at the beginning. It is an invitation to them to come here, and they are most welcome. As to the other officials of the Navy Department who see fit to come here and sit in the galleries in order to listen to the debate, they have just as much right there as any other person, and surely they are just as much interested in what takes place here relative to the Navy and other public activities as any other citizen; so why should they be criticized from the floor where we are protected in what we say by reason of the privileges of this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. UPDIKE].

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 21 minutes remaining for the bill, and there is 1 hour and 20 minutes remaining against the bill. The gentleman from Oklahoma has 55 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Georgia 47 minutes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to use five minutes time now.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. McCLINTIC. But I control the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is fair to recognize the gentleman from Oklahoma because the opponents of the bill have not used up as much time as have the proponents of the bill. The Chair, therefore, recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma for five minutes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as our minority leader is not on the floor, I want to say a few words with respect to the colloquy that has just taken place. I regret exceedingly that any Cabinet member would ever take a seat on this floor during the discussion of a bill in which his department is interested. I feel that by so doing Cabinet officers seek to influence or bring a certain amount of influence to bear on the Congress in favor of the bill which they want to see enacted into law.

I take the same position that I would take if there were a bill under consideration here affecting an individual Member. I think that a Member ought to withdraw either from the committee or from the floor if the measure related to something in which he is vitally interested. So I respectfully disagree with the majority leader in the statement he has made, and I say to you that this conduct on the part of the Secretary of the Navy is a bad precedent, that it is bad form, and I do not think it ought to be done again during the discussion of any piece of legislation where the Cabinet member is head of the department affected by the bill. Of course, the rule allows Cabinet members to come on the floor, and ought to allow it, but a Cabinet officer ought to have sufficient judgment and common sense not to appear in such a discussion as this. It ought not to be done, and I hope it will not be done again. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has given me credit for 20 minutes. Please put that down on my side. Before I am through I may need it. Now I am going to yield 10 minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. UPDIKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has any control of the time. The rule provides that one half the time is to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the other half by the gentleman from Oklahoma; the one in favor of and the other against the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York yielded that time back to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that one-half the time shall be used by those favoring the bill and one-half by those against it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The truth is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Oklahoma were to use the time with the understanding that one-half of it was to be allotted to those opposed to the bill and one-half to those who favored it. I told the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he could use 20 minutes of the time remaining at my disposal.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Chair will not take that time away from me. I may need it badly.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If it is permissible under the rule for me to yield to the gentleman from Indiana, I will gladly yield to him 10 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. That is very good.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. UPDIKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, there seems to have been a great deal of discussion with reference to the Secretary of the Navy being on the floor of the House during the consideration of this bill. Personally, I think it is a very fine thing that the Secretary is here at the discussion of this bill. He knows he has an interest in and heavy responsibility for this bill as Secretary of the Navy! I am also glad to see the Assistant Secretary of the Navy here. I do not think it is any worse for the Assistant Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of the Navy to be here on the floor of the House than for the head of a pacific organization to be sitting there in the gallery. A man who has been disbarred from all the public schools in the District of Columbia. It seems to me that there is a great deal of misrepresentation going on through this Congress which is prejudicing the minds of the people with reference to our national defense. This misrepresentation is directly charged to the heads of these pacifist organizations. I want to quote some statements that are being sent out by them. This man in the gallery said that "The time to stop war between England and Japan and the United States is within the next three weeks," realizing then that no war was in sight or even contemplated.

That is the kind of trash that has gone out to the people of this country and has prejudiced the minds of some good people against this bill, and providing an adequate national defense for this country of ours. I went to war once—unprepared—and I have two boys that I do not want to send forward into the front-line trenches unprepared.

What else do these people send out? Here is a declaration which they send out in which they say:

> I declare it to be my intention never to aid in or sanction war, offensive or defensive.

Why, gentlemen of this House, any man who is not willing to defend his country is not a good American citizen. [Applause.] Of course, we all want to prevent war, but there are times when it is necessary to defend this country of ours, and I say to you, that any man who is not willing to defend it is not a good American citizen. [Applause.]

We had a man who appeared before our committee, a Doctor Gordon, protesting against this naval program. He told us, in answer to a question, that he had been in this country for 23 years. We asked him then when he took out his first citizenship papers, and he said, "Two years ago." He was a British subject. Imagine a man being in this country for 23 years and failing to become an American citizen for 21 years of that time, and then coming in and telling us what size of a Navy to build in this country!

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. UPDIKE. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to recall to the gentleman's memory the fact that while the gentleman he has just referred to was a British subject in this country for that number of years, in the latter two years he has been associated with these people who are obstructing the efforts of patriotic Americans to secure national preparedness.

Mr. UPDIKE. That is exactly right. We also had another gentleman before the committee, Dr. William I. Hull, professor of international relations and history at Swarthmore College. He is teaching the young manhood of this country, and in answer to a question propounded to him as to whether or not he thought the war of 1776 with Great Britain was justified he said, "That is a debatable question." When pressed further as to what would have happened if we had not gone to war with Great Britain in 1776 he said, "Probably they would have moved over here to the mainland." Then we asked him whether he thought that was right or not, and he still said, "That is a debatable question." That same gentleman a few days ago said I was un-American. The Philadelphia newspapers called me and asked me what I had to say about it. I said, "I served my country in the front-line trenches and was wounded five times on the battle field," and I asked where he was during that time. [Applause.]

It is time that the patriotic citizens of this country stamped out this misrepresentation. I do not maintain on the floor of this House this afternoon that everybody who is opposed to this program is not conscientious, but I do say that they are being misled by the trash that is being sent throughout the length and breadth of this country under the leadership of these organizations.

Now, what have we done with reference to this $274,000,000 program which we have brought in? We said at the Geneva conference that we needed 15 cruisers to round out our fleet; that regardless of what any other nation in the world needed we needed 15 cruisers to round out our own fleet. And that is exactly what we have brought before you to-day. We compare favorably with other nations with reference to submarines, and so the committee said, "We will disregard the submarine program at this time, because in case of a national emergency we can build a submarine within six or eight months."

Then we got down to airplane carriers. They wanted five airplane carriers, and we said that with the experience we had with reference to the Saratoga and Lexington, both of which had proved a little too large, that we would not build any more large airplane carriers. They asked for smaller ones, and we said, "We will build one smaller airplane carrier and we would see whether it is suitable or not. If it is satisfactory, then we will build more later." That is good, common sense, is it not? As far as the destroyer leaders are concerned, we have already authorized 12 destroyer leaders which can be built, and, therefore, it was useless for us to consider adding any more to this program at the present time.

This entire program, as it has been brought forth by the committee, is perfectly justified. Japan, since the Washington conference in 1921, has built 107 or 108 ships. England has built up into the sixties; and I want to say to you that we have built only 4 or 5 in the United States. Talk about our setting a precedent! Talk about our leading the way for peace! If the United States Government has not acted in good faith, what in the name of God can we do?

We proposed a treaty in 1921, and we scrapped a lot of our capital ships. We have made two efforts since that time to have a limitation of armaments, but we have been unsuccessful. I have no doubt in my mind but that if there was any possibility at all for a further limitation of armaments in the future the United States Government would be well in the lead and be ready and willing to do everything within its power for a further limitation of armaments. But, gentlemen, when the other nations refuse to agree upon a program, and when they say they will not agree to scrap any of their cruisers without considering the competitive proposition, we must take into consideration the relativity of those other nations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I think that in a fair distribution of the wisdom we are having this afternoon we ought to hear from our friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER]. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BERGER. Thirty minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. And then the gentleman will vote for the bill?

Mr. BERGER. I will answer that later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is very hard for a Socialist to get over his point of view to an assemblage like this. You have a different psychology. I understand you very well, because I had it once upon a time, but you do not understand me. You still linger to-day where I was yesterday.

THE "PACIFIST" SCARES EVERY MILITARIST

Moreover, the average man, especially the average Congressman from Chicago, does not know the difference between socialism, anarchism, nihilism, communism, and rheumatism. [Laughter.] They are all fearful and wicked "isms" to him.

Anything he does not like is Bolshevism or communism. Or when he is very angry he may even call it socialism. But the greatest epithet in his little mind is to call a man a "pacifist."

To be a pacifist is the acme of depravity and high treason to the "paytriot" afflicted with the 100 per cent "kill 'em dead" militarism, a disease very common in our country since we went into the World War to avenge the "little baby fingers of Belgium," "make the world safe for democracy," "and abolish war forever."

OUR COUNTRY INVADED ONLY ONCE IN HISTORY

At that, gentlemen, I want you to understand that the socialist movement, as such, was not and is not a pacifist movement. The socialists, however, did not and do not believe in commercial, dynastic, imperialistic, or nationalistic wars.

The socialists always did and still do believe that wars sometimes can not be avoided, if we want to emancipate or free a nation or a class from oppression or exploitation or slavery. And, furthermore, I want it understood that we will always fight to defend our country in a case of actual invasion by hostile forces. Such a case happened to us only once in the history of our country—in the war with England (1812–1815) and will probably never happen again. Our Nation was very young and weak when the British came up the Potomac, sacked Washington, and burned the Capitol. The British would be rather ill advised if they tried such a mean trick now.

"DEFENSIVE" WARS USUALLY A SMOKE SCREEN OF DIPLOMATS

Now, as to fighting, my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is only half a socialist, and often the wrong half at that. But he is a good fighter. For his splendid fighting qualities I like him, even when I do not agree with him. Socialists, if they want to be good socialists, must be good fighters. And they must have moral and physical courage.

Nevertheless, since the World War, it is true that the socialist parties of the world have become more pacifist than ever. They now positively reject the so-called "defensive" war, because it is hard to define, as the World War has clearly proven, and is usually only a smoke screen of the diplomats. [Applause.]

ALAS! GERMANS DID NOT READ THE WASHINGTON POST AND WALL STREET JOURNAL

One of our colleagues asked me if it be a fact that socialists would fight only in wars for liberty, how was it that the socialists of Germany in the last war fought against the French and their allies?

My answer is that the socialists of Germany read only German papers. There they were told that the Russians and the French and the English were envious of the growth of Germany in trade, culture, and power, and wanted to destroy the Reich.

Then these German socialists were also told, and it was proven to their satisfaction, that the Czar's Cossacks had crossed the Niemen and were murdering men and violating women and laying waste to the country. These socialists then naturally believed that their country was invaded and that they had to defend their homes.

You see, these German socialists did not read the Washington Post or the Wall Street Journal. And in their blighted ignorance they did not know that this was "a war to make the world safe for democracy," to "abolish militarism," and to "end all wars forever." And they really never found it out, either. Had they read the Washington Post, the Wall Street Journal, and similar papers they would have been enlightened upon that subject. [Laughter.]

"DEVIL DOGS" BECOME TENTACLES OF "DEVIL FISH"

Socialist parties the world over have always opposed large standing armies. These are invariably class armies. And socialists are especially opposed to hired armies, because such troops naturally become the willing tool of the class or of the government that hires and pays them.

And socialists are also opposed to large navies, since their chief function is to protect foreign investments. Thus the navy becomes the strong right arm of imperialism—and the marines become real "devil dogs" and tentacles of the "devil fish," of the octopus of capitalism.

MODERN IMPERIALISM NATIONAL OUTCOME OF MODERN CAPITALISM

And this offers an opportunity to explain the meaning of the term "imperialism." The word "imperialism" did not originate with the German Empire, as many Americans, and particularly many American newspaper editors, imagined during the World War. It came from the word "imperium" and harks back to the days of world rule by the Romans. Many nations held the "imperium." For a while during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it seemed that Spain would rule the world. After the decline of Spain little Holland and Sweden held the "imperium" for a short period, but only England could lay claim to be a world power during the last 150 years, especially after the downfall of Napoleon I.

The term "imperialism" as it has been used during the last two generations is only very loosely connected with "imperialism" in a political sense. Modern imperialism as understood is based on modern economics and is deeply rooted in the very nature of capitalist economy.

WHY WE HAVE A SURPLUS OF COMMODITIES

Under the present wage system, also called the profit system, the wages received by the workers of any industrialized nation are insufficient to enable them to buy back with their wages everything that they have produced, because as a class the workmen can not receive the full value of their labor. The employing class makes a profit on their labor, and must make a profit in order to carry on business.

And since the workers of a nation have not received the full value of their production, they naturally can not buy back that production with their wages. That also holds good for the farmer who gets skinned by the capitalist system in various ways. And, after all, the workmen and farmers form the great bulk of the Nation.

Thus a surplus of products accumulates.

WE PRODUCE ONLY FOR THOSE WHO CAN BUY, NOT FOR THOSE WHO NEED THINGS

The capitalist class, being small in number, can not consume all the surplus. The surplus must be exported to foreign markets. All the western nations, where capitalism has developed, are compelled, therefore, to look for foreign markets, for the world market, to dispose of that surplus.

Moreover, in every industrialized nation—which to-day means every western civilized nation—it becomes increasingly difficult for the capitalists to invest their accumulated profits to advantage in their own country. These capitalists are constantly forced to look for foreign fields.

Every civilized country, or at least every country that is highly developed industrially, is in exactly the same position in that respect; and of late Japan, since Japan has accepted our capitalist civilization, has joined this struggle and strife for the world market.

And, remember, this surplus production is growing very rapidly with the improved machinery. Naturally, therefore, as machinery improves it is getting increasingly harder to get markets. But markets every industrial nation must have, because we are not producing for use—we are producing to sell. We are not producing for those who need the products; we are producing only for those who can buy them, whether they need them or not. If those who need the goods have no money, then they can not get them; that is all.

Understand me right. There can be no doubt that the workmen and farmers of a nation could use up all the surplus goods, or most of them, if they had the means with which to get them. Under our present system, however, our workmen and farmers as a class can never get these means.

CONTINUOUSLY LOOKING FOR FOREIGN MARKETS

All civilized nations, as I said, are in the same fix; all produce more with their improved machinery than any of them can sell in their own country, and all the owners of that production must look for foreign markets.

To a certain extent, of course, the various countries can exchange their products, and they do so.

But there is another difficulty. Every business man must be selfish if he wants to succeed, and voluntarily "business" will never give up any of its home markets. Most modern nations, including our own, put up a high tariff. They want to export, not to import. They want no foreign goods to come into their own country, because they might sell still less and have a still larger surplus. At least that is what they fear.

Except of certain products of which this or the other country may have a monopoly for some reason or other, as, for instance, rubber, coffee, potassium, and so forth, the surplus production therefore must be thrown into the world market, where they all compete with each other.

All civilized nations, therefore, are continuously on the lookout for new markets. They look for them in Asia, Africa, South America, and wherever there are backward peoples who can not produce these things themselves.

USE EVEN RELIGION AS A VEHICLE

According to official figures the United States exported in 1927 products to the amount of $4,968,485,000. In 1926 Great Britain exported products to the amount of approximately $3,260,000,000, while Germany, in the same year, exported products to the amount of almost $2,000,000,000; France about $2,362,000,000; Belgium, about one-third of that of France; and Japan, about $1,000,000,000.

In order to stimulate a demand for their products modern nations even use religion as a vehicle. They send our missionaries to make Christians out of African savages in order to make them ashamed of going without trousers or shoes or hats or other things of which civilized nations have a surplus.

THE OPIUM WAR

During the last 100 years England even had two wars with China—one in 1839 to 1842 and another in 1863—because the Chinese Government refused to permit the smuggling of opium from India to the Chinese Empire. The English won the wars.

The drug—although considered poison—was poured into China at the rate of 1 ton per hour for 12 hours every day for some 60 years until the Chinese revolution in 1911 brought the traffic to an end.

This is one aspect of economic imperialism.

WHERE "OIL" BLESSINGS FLOW!

The other and even more important side of economic imperialism is the search for raw material—oil, metals, rubber, lumber, and so forth.

Some of the savage, barbaric, or backward peoples are in possession of very valuable lands—excellent for agriculture, or covered with wonderful forests, or containing valuable land minerals, and above all, containing oil—oil which has become one of the greatest economic assets of the present day.

Capitalist nations will stop at nothing to get hold of such lands.

SPREAD CIVILIZATION AND MAKE MONEY

I have spoken before of capitalists looking around for chances to invest their capital profitably. And that is also natural enough, because capital, which is not profitably invested, very soon ceases to be capital.

Thus, these capitalists, especially English, French, German, and American capitalists, cast their eagle eye upon the undeveloped areas of backward nations. They are eager to develop them—to spread civilization and to make money.

That is usually done first by "concessions." They get the right or the privilege to build railroads, to start big ranges, to plant fruit trees, banana, coffee, sugar cane, or pineapple, according to the nature of the country.

Here we have the two main sources of imperialism.

One is the continued profitable disposal of the huge output of surplus commodities of all industrially developed nations. The other is the necessity of commanding the sources of supply for raw materials for these industries, and to invest money in profitable undertakings.

But there is also a third root of economic imperialism, and that is the financial.

FINANCIAL IMPERIALISM

When capital has accumulated in large fortunes—when the rate of interest is beginning to fall at home—then our capitalists discover that there are many uncivilized races, or even races who have a very old civilization, that are weak and can not defend themselves, but all of whom can be more easily exploited than the dear, fellow citizens at home. Then the export of capital to such countries becomes more attractive to the profit-making capitalists—than its use for the extension of manufacturing facilities at home.

Now remember, gentlemen—especially you pacifists who are not socialists—if the story is true that trade follows the flag, then the flag must also follow the investor or the money lender and protect him.

WE ARE WILLING TO MAKE THESE BACKWARD NATIONS HONEST

There is also this to be considered: These backward peoples have a moral code of their own. And they do not willingly enter into lasting business relations with civilized men. Those backward folks do business in their own way and according to their own notions. They often lie and cheat and are hard to do business with. [Laughter.]

Our civilized business men will then tell you that it is therefore necessary for the purposes of trade and civilization that these backward nations—or ancient nations—be compelled to be "honest"; that they be compelled to live up to such rules of conduct as will make trade possible and lucrative for civilized Americans, Englishmen, Germans, or other "Nordics" who have invested their money. [Laughter and applause.]

A warlike front therefore becomes necessary all the time, and armaments and warlike demonstrations have become a part of the regular apparatus of business, so far as business is concerned with the world market.

POINT OF VIEW CHANGES WITH INCREASING COMPETITION

True, these business men and investors originally do not dream of making any conquests. They do not think of war. They are at first indifferent as to the territorial growth of their country. All they want is to do business, but that point of view changes the moment their investments are in danger.

Thus, for instance, as long as Great Britain had a natural monopoly of the raw materials and the markets of the world British manufacturers and merchants were rather indifferent as to the growth of the British Empire. There were even some British economists and politicians who did not care for the colonies and considered them as rather useless encumbrances, involving an expense to the British taxpayer.

Exactly the same thing happens in America to-day; some of our American economists and politicians do not think of navies, armies, and war in connection with the world market.

But with the increasing competition—and with the entry of the manufacturers and merchants of the United States and of Germany, and even of Japan, into the world markets—the British point of view changed.

JOHN BRIGHT, JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN, AND LORD MILNER

Thus, for instance, John Bright, a cotton manufacturer in Manchester in the middle of the nineteenth century—a period when British cotton goods had the undisputed control of the markets both in England and abroad—was a pacifist. John Bright was also a convinced free trader, an antimilitarist, and a radical leader.

But Joseph Chamberlain, of Birmingham, his successor in the leadership of the English radicals, 15 years later, was just as convinced that pacifism was a fallacy. He was even willing to consider a high tariff for Great Britain. He said in 1897:

> The empire is commerce. For these reasons, among others, I would never loosen the hold which we now have on our great Indian dependency. For the same reason I approve the continued occupation of Egypt. And lastly, it is for the same reasons I hold that our navy should be strengthened until its supremacy is so assured that we can not be shaken in any of the possessions we hold or shall ever hold hereafter.

And still later, Lord Milner said in an address to the Manchester Conservative Club in 1906:

> You can not have prosperity without power. This country must remain a great power or it will become a poor country. But greatness is relative. We can not retain by ourselves the same relative importance among the vast empires of the modern world which we held in the days of the smaller States, which England held before the growth of Russia and the United States, which England held before united Germany made those giant strides in prosperity and commerce, which have been the direct result of the development of military and naval strength.

So much for the relation of the Navy to the world markets.

I KNOW BETTER

And now as to the American foreign investments. We are told that——

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Not now. Afterwards I will. If I were a believer or adherent of the present system, I would be a Republican of the blackest kind. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman want more time?

Mr. BERGER. I am not a believer of the present system, however; I know better.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I decline to yield the gentleman more time. [Laughter.]

PACIFISTS WHO REJECT SOCIALISM ARE INCONSISTENT

Mr. BERGER. Now, the fact is this: Anybody who believes that this capitalist system is to last forever, or for a very long time to come, and who desires the greatest possible development of our strength in the world market, must also stand ready to defend this trade and these investments to the fullest extent.

He must also be willing to have a strong armed force, especially a big Navy. He must favor an air fleet, numerous enough not only to overawe the so-called backward nations and to compel them to live up to any obligations that they have undertaken, or into which they were cajoled—but especially also capable of defending American trade and American investments in case of any complications with any great competitor and first-class power, as, for instance, Great Britain.

There is nothing cheaper—and more silly and childish—than a pacifists who is not a socialist—who is wealthy and in favor of the capitalist system and willing to enjoy all its benefits and yet is unwilling to grant this capitalist system that makes his privileges possible the absolutely necessary means for its further development and security. I have in mind some of our wealthy pacifists who reject the Socialist Party and the Socialist propaganda—the only effective means of combating imperialism—but who continuously yelp against the Army and Navy.

SOCIALISTS ALONE ARE LOGICAL IN THEIR STAND FOR WORLD PEACE

Of course, if we had socialistic governments, even while capitalist system still exists in England, France, Germany, Italy, the United States, and Russia, it would be an easy matter to do away with the armies and navies. All we would need is to have an international force to guarantee security and good order on the high seas, and wherever necessary. But with governments that exist solely as the political arm of modern business, with its continuous and unabating strife and struggle for the world market, disarmament must remain a Utopian dream.

Of all political creeds and organizations only the socialists can with good conscience and good logic agitate and vote for disarmament and world peace.

MAY HAVE SOME INTERESTING EXPERIENCES

Under the present system, however, I am not in a position to decide whether 15 cruisers or 75 cruisers are sufficient to secure our position in the world market and defend our investments. If we should get into trouble with any first-class power or with any combination of powers, as, for instance, Great Britain and Japan—or Great Britain and some European allies—we would undoubtedly have some interesting experiences.

I do not say this is going to happen in the near future, since Europe is financially busted and the horrors of the World War are still fresh in mind; but if this system is to last, and we continue to grow in the world market—such a combination some day is not only probable but almost certain. Anybody who knows history and has studied political economy will agree with me.

Of course, some men, though not students, instinctively fear that this will happen—although for the sake of policy they do not express this fear.

AMERICA SIMPLY ACCEPTS THE SUPERIORITY OF GREAT BRITAIN

The proposition of building only fifteen 10,000-ton cruisers, contained in the majority report, is the result of that policy.

These gentlemen say the program of 25 cruisers to be built at the rate of 5 a year for five years would have been interpreted as an aggressive program by Great Britain. With 25 cruisers of the 10,000-ton class the American Navy could attack and imperil British commerce in the event of war, and a successful attack of that type would mean the end of Great Britain's rule over the seven seas.

But with only 15 cruisers of that class America can not do very much. We surely could not dispute the British control of the high seas and can not do much damage to the British trade. [Applause.]

It is a halfway measure only—neither big enough to do any harm—nor small enough to do any real good. And it officially accepts the inferiority of America to Great Britain, for the time being.

NAVY NOW LARGELY A MATTER OF WINDOW DRESSING

But since I, as a socialist, am not particularly concerned with the inferiority of our Navy, especially since I have serious doubts whether it would be very effective in defending the country in these days of submarines and airplanes—I am not interested in the size of the naval program, and will therefore vote against it.

A war in which we can use that Navy against a first-class power for anything except for the purpose of destroying commerce, is now almost impossible. The Navy now is very largely a matter of window dressing, and it is only very handy against second-rate or backward nations.

WHY HELL BROKE LOOSE IN 1914

Now to sum up this side of the picture, remember:

Capitalism inevitably leads to imperialism. The slogan of our business men will inevitably be "Civis Americanus sum," I am a citizen of America and have to be backed up by the Army and Navy.

And sooner or later this brings about war—war not only to subjugate backward nations but also to destroy competitors.

When, in the first six months of 1914, the German world trade became as large as the British—the World War did not delay.

WHO WILL BE NEXT?

True, Germany is crushed. But Germany's place in world politics and also in the world markets is rapidly being taken by the United States of America. We are now Great Britain's most powerful competitor.

The statistics issued by the Department of Commerce tell a vivid story.

And anybody who reads the English papers and periodicals with an open eye can already feel the deep resentment.

Great Britain is determined to uphold its "imperium" and its rule of the seven seas.

Great Britain has so far been very successful in destroying its competitors for the world market. Great Britain has annihilated the sea power of Spain, France, Holland, and Germany.

Whom will Great Britain try to annihilate next? [Applause.]

82 PER CENT FOR PAST AND FUTURE WARS

I do not want to answer the question. I leave it to some of you gentlemen to speculate about. I hope that by the time this question has to be answered we shall have socialist governments in all the great civilized countries—socialist governments (or at least socialistic governments) that will know how to avoid war.

And that is the only hope. Remember—the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927—attributed 82 per cent of the Federal expenditures for 1927 to past and future wars. The following words of our Secretary of the Treasury, taken from his most recent report to Congress, are well worth considering:

> When the average citizen grumbles over the size of his income-tax payment he often visualizes his hard-earned money being spent by the Government to compile reports on business or agricultural conditions, or to erect public buildings, send diplomats abroad, carry on scientific investigations, or make and enforce laws. As a matter of fact, a small part of the taxpayer's dollar goes into work of this sort, only about one-sixth being used for all the multitudinous types of ordinary civil functions added together. One-half of each tax dollar is used for the service of the public debt. * * * The remaining one-third of the taxpayer's dollar is spent on military expenditures for national defense or payments to military veterans.
> * * *. In modern times the Federal tax burden of one generation is largely determined by the military activities of the preceding one. In the fiscal year 1927 expenditures for interest on the public debt exceeded by over $140,000,000 the aggregate amount of ordinary civil expenditures and exceeded the amount of all retirements of the public debt by nearly $70,000,000.

Even militarists admit that preparedness for war only leads to war.

WHAT THE CHIEF OF THE BRITISH GENERAL STAFF SAYS ABOUT PREPAREDNESS

Field Marshal Sir William Robertson, one of England's distinguished soldiers, who served from 1915 as chief of the imperial general staff of the British Army, made the following statement in a recent address:

> We no longer agree, without qualification, that the best way of preventing war is to prepare for it. Instead of preventing war, we know that preparations are apt to precipitate it. Never in history were preparations so complete or so widespread as during the 50 or 60 years previous to 1914, and yet never were wars so frequent as in that period.
> I suggest that every man and woman should energetically support all efforts made for devising some more sensible and humane way of composing international differences than the destructive and futile methods upon which reliance has hitherto been unsuccessfully placed. This suggestion happens to represent the only conclusion I can reach after a military career covering a period of exactly 50 years—a period during which I was for some 20 years closely connected with the highest councils of state in which, in some form or other, international questions of armaments and war were daily under consideration.

This is one of the hopeful signs of change of general sentiment; but, of course, it will not do away with the cause of wars.

AMERICA WOULD NEVER HAVE GOTTEN INTO THE WORLD WAR

A more hopeful sign is that the resolution of our distinguished colleague, Senator THEODORE E. BURTON, prohibiting the export of war materials to an "aggressor" nation, has been changed by a unanimous vote in the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to place an embargo on the shipment of such materials "to any nation which is engaged in war with another."

This is a most excellent modification, because it touches business—war profits. And because it places our power directly against war. If such a law would have prevailed in 1914, the war would not have lasted over six months, peace would have been concluded shortly after the Marne, and America would never have gotten into the bloody business. Our profiteers kept up the World War when it was about ready to collapse—as all well-informed men are now aware.

I can appreciate the change of sentiment among our leading men.

WHEN THE POWDER TRUST HAD ITS LITTLE JOKE

I remember that at the convention of the League to Enforce Peace, held in Philadelphia in 1915, when I put in a resolution to place an embargo on ammunition—not even on food, mind you, only an embargo on ammunition—to both sides of the combat, this was ruled out of order with the characteristic remark that such a resolution was "more German than germane."

The witty and "humane" remark was made by Justice Gray, the attorney of the du Pont Powder Trust. [Laughter.]

The Powder Trust, of course, showed a profit of as much as $560,000,000 in one single year of the war—and the trust had many reasons to oppose my resolution. That murderous interest was not German and not American, but it was "germane."

MYTHS—GUILTY NATION AND INNOCENT NATION

And another most hopeful sign of our times is found in the current discussion—of not of who won the World War, but who was most guilty in bringing on the war.

The question of relative war guilt has been hotly debated of late—the opposing sides mostly resting their case on official documents.

The simple fact, however, is this:

"The myth of the guilty nation" is always accompanied by "the myth of the innocent nation."

Through a reckless and lying propaganda each nation soon became obsessed with the glory of victory and with the illusion of the depravity of the opposing peoples. In each country, also, for the time being, as Romain Rolland observed, "The people hated worst of all those who refused to hate."

DEGENERATING EFFECT OF WARS

There is one phase which is generally ignored, but is most important when we consider the subject of international war, and that is the inevitable decadence in the effectiveness and virility of warlike nations. Thus the warlike German tribes of the early Middle Ages have all disappeared entirely.

I just mention the Goths, the Vandals, the Longobards, and others.

It was proven that owing to the Napoleonic wars the average size of the French people was diminished by more than 1 inch. This thesis was stated best by Charles Darwin, when he said:

> In every country in which a standing army is kept up the fairest young men are taken to the conscription camp or are enlisted. They are thus exposed to early death during war or are often tempted into vice and are prevented from marrying during the prime of life. On the other hand, the shorter and feebler men, with poor constitutions, are left at home and consequently have a much better chance of marrying and propagating their kind.

In the World War the manhood of our race was wasted as never before in history.

ALL LESS FREE, LESS WISE, AND FEEBLER IN BODY AND SPIRIT

Every nation concerned is exhausted and humiliated, not only in our own generation but will be for generations to come.

The future of our Nation, however, rests with the men who are left, and there can be no question that all the white peoples must be less courageous, less wise, less free, and feebler in body and spirit than before this terrible and senseless sacrifice. And what did America get out of this war except cripples, millionaires, debts, high taxes, the "flu," and prohibition?

WANT TO GO ON RECORD AGAINST CAPITALISM AND IMPERIALISM

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if I were not a socialist I might vote for the minority report, for the proposition submitted by Mr. McCLINTIC, which I believe provides sufficient and adequate defense for America while Europe is exhausted and still remembers the World War.

Since I am a socialist, however, and do not believe in having an Army and a Navy just for the purpose of supporting the imperialistic growth of our capitalist class, which as a matter of business will sooner or later bring about a coalition of the European nations and possibly Japan against us—similar to the one with which Germany had to contend—I shall vote against both the majority and minority reports. I simply want to go on record against capitalism and imperialism.

PREPARE FOR PEACE AND YOU MAY GET PEACE

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. No; I can not. I will only repeat that capitalism, wherever successful and full grown, necessarily leads to imperialism, and imperialism inevitably leads to war. If we want to abolish war we must abolish the causes of war and the reasons for war. Building war vessels, making poison gas and armored tanks will not abolish war. Neither will pious resolutions and peace tracts. Modern wars have economic causes.

As for preparedness, I agree with the English general whom I have just quoted, that if you prepare for war you will surely get war. And I will add, if you prepare for peace you may have peace. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the hour is late and I will not long abuse your patience. I claim no technical or expert knowledge in reference to naval affairs. In a general way I have studied the history of the development of the United States Navy, and I have some knowledge of the naval history of the nations of ancient and modern times.

Several members who have spoken in support of this extravagant Navy construction program have deliberately sought to create the impression that those who oppose this measure are pacifists and deficient in patriotism. This insinuation is so utterly ridiculous that its refutation is obviously an act of supererogation. I wonder if these supercilious gentlemen are as brave as they are blustering. Since when did these self-appointed judges of human motives and guardians of the Nation's destiny obtain a monopoly on intelligence and patriotism? These gentlemen have traveled far afield from the facts and, intoxicated by the rhythm of their inane and innocuous sentences, are taking themselves too seriously, and, like the fly riding on the spoke of the chariot wheel, they, in self-adulation and supreme conceit, say "What a dust I am kicking up!" These gentlemen who are snapping at their colleagues and barking "Pacifists! Pacifists!" doubtless imagine that they are the Pleiades who fly before Orion in the legislative heavens. I am no pacifist, and I yield to no one in my loyalty and devotion to my country and her institutions, and I am opposed to all wars of aggression. I oppose all wars except such as may be necessary to repel invasion, protect our national honor, defend our just national interests, and preserve our free institutions. I would not have my country sacrifice its dignity, honor, or substantial interests, but I am convinced all these could be preserved by sane diplomatic negotiations. I would not be parsimonious in voting funds reasonably necessary to maintain an adequate Navy.

On the other hand, I am not a militarist, and I decline to take orders from the manufacturers of munitions, armament, and armor plate in the United States without whose propaganda, and without the propaganda of their interallied organizations, this Congress would not to-day be facing this proposal.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. No.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I was going to ask the gentleman it he would furnish the House with the basis——

Mr. LOZIER. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman. I want to be courteous, but I have only a little time and the hour is late. I certainly have a right to make a connected speech without Members of the Naval Committee, who control the time, injecting their ideas continually into my remarks and into the remarks of everyone opposed to this bill; and I say this with all due respect to the gentleman from Georgia, whom I esteem as an upstanding, forward-looking man and as a very helpful legislator. But I must decline to accept his views or the views of anyone else backing this measure. I repeat, the shipyards, munition makers, builders of armor plate and armament, aided by other organizations, including the Navy League and certain naval and ex-naval officers, have for years flooded the country with propaganda and misleading information in reference to the naval situation at home and abroad. These pestiferous groups have boldly prophesied another war and sought to create the impression that our national existence would be seriously menaced unless we build a great Navy. These outside efforts have been aided by well-meaning men in Congress who, deluded by the sophistry of swivel-chair naval experts and the constant hammering of a few frenzied newspapers, have reached the point where they, like the pockmarked Mirabeau, are ever dreaming of storms and wars in times of peace.

Now, gentlemen, this is supposed to be a proposition involving the expenditure of $274,000,000. I assert that much more is involved in this legislative proposal. I hold in my hand a bill (H. R. 7359) introduced December 14, 1927, five days after Congress convened, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which called for the construction of 71 vessels and involved an expenditure of approximately $740,000,000.

It is generally understood that this bill at that time represented the views of the administration in reference to the building of battleships. I do not think that anyone will deny that this bill (H. R. 7359) was introduced as an administration measure, and if the country had not risen in revolt we would now be considering this $740,000,000 battleship-building program instead of the $274,000,000 program embodied in H. R. 11526.

Later on the Navy Department furnished the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs a table showing in detail the proposed battleship-building program, the ultimate cost of which was more than $4,000,000,000 to be expended in a period of nine years. So I am justified in saying that there is more involved in this proposition than the expenditure of $274,000,000.

The proposal in the pending bill to expend $274,000,000 in the next three years is only a part of the predetermined program. This initial expenditure of $274,000,000 is just the beginning of the big naval building program that before its completion will dig billions of dollars out of the pockets of the American people.

It is understood that Secretary Wilbur and President Coolidge at the time Congress convened were in favor of building an enormous Navy and had so expressed themselves, and it can not be denied that H. R. 7359, introduced by the chairman of the committee, represented the views of Secretary Wilbur and the views of the President. Taking into consideration the addresses which were made by the President and by Secretary Wilbur, we are justified in concluding that this first bill, introduced by Chairman BUTLER, embodies the purposes and plans of the administration, and that the Navy Department would have this Nation enter upon a naval building program which would call ultimately not for the expenditure of $274,000,000 only, but for the expenditure of $740,000,000, and which according to later tables furnished by the Navy Department would call for the expenditure in the next nine years of more than $4,000,000,000. I therefore assert this bill represents the beginning of a plan and program which has for its ultimate purpose the construction of a mighty battleship fleet at a cost between two and four billion dollars.

It seems to me there is no occasion for war and no probability of any war within the life of any person now living in the United States. I decline to be stampeded by propaganda about the probability of another war. This story that we might become involved in war with Great Britain and Japan is simply preposterous. There will never be a war between the two great English-speaking nations. England has too much involved to provoke a quarrel or a military contest with the United States. In the event of a war between Great Britain and the United States, England knows the first thing we would do would be to take Canada, her choicest colonial possession. England, by reason of her far-flung empire, must necessarily have a larger navy than any other nation, because England is mistress of the sea. When Lord Nelson destroyed the French fleet at Aboukir, Napoleon Bonaparte said: "Wherever wood can swim, there I am sure to find this flag of England." And on another occasion he said: "To France the fates have decreed the empire of the land, to England that of the sea."

Moreover, the greatness of England's maritime power was not built on great battleships, but her great naval power is due to the fact that she nurtured and developed the greatest merchant marine the world has ever known. In 1586 a Portuguese ship was captured by Sir Francis Drake and brought into an English port. It was a vessel the like of which no English shipowner had ever seen. The vessel was laden with silks, spices, and gold from India. In 1593 one of Sir Walter Raleigh's ships under the command of Sir John Burroughs captured a Portuguese ship of 1,600 tons burden and carrying 700 men and 36 brass cannon. This vessel was brought into the port of Dartmouth and its size greatly exceeded any English ship. Its cargo consisted of gold, silk, porcelain, pearls, drugs, ivory, calico, and spices. This greatly excited the interest of the English people, who began to plan to get a part of the East Indian trade. The English shipowners got an inspiration from these wonderful vessels and they immediately set out to develop a great merchant marine. The British naval power came as a result of the development of her merchant marine.

Since the curtain went up on human history, there have been innumerable instances where nations with great navies have been destroyed by nations having smaller navies, and also where mighty nations with great armies and seemingly irresistible military power and equipment have been defeated and destroyed by nations having but little military equipment and power.

No nation has ever been able to permanently perpetuate itself by maintaining a large military and naval establishment. Every great nation that has relied on military or naval power has ultimately met defeat and disaster. Call the roll from the dawn of history to the present, and you will find the track of the centuries cluttered with the shattered fragments of nations that relied on their armies and navies. If we are depending on military and naval prowess, we are building our national edifice on shifting sands.

Take the Punic wars between Rome and Carthage. Before the first of these wars Carthage had a strong navy and was mistress of the seas, while Rome had no navy. Rome was a great military power on land. Mr. Gibbon, in his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, said in reference to the naval activities of Rome:

> The ambition of the Romans was confined to the land; nor was that warlike people ever actuated by the enterprising spirit which had prompted the navigators of Tyre, of Carthage, and even of Marseille, to enlarge the bounds of the world and to explore the most remote coasts of the ocean. To the Romans the ocean remained an object of terror rather than of curiosity.

When the Roman commonwealth determined to destroy its rival, Carthage, it encountered what seemed to be an insurmountable obstacle, because at that time Rome had no fleet, or at least none that justified that title, while the Carthaginians had control of the sea and completely dominated all the maritime Roman cities. We are told that a Carthaginian vessel was driven onto the Italian coast in a storm and the Romans used this wrecked vessel as a model for their ships, and this marked the beginning of the Roman navy, which they hoped would materially aid them in destroying Carthage. With a fleet built without shipwrights and unmanned by experienced seamen, the Consul Duilius was the first who ventured to sea with this crude Roman armament. Duilius met the Carthaginian fleet near the Lipari Islands, north of Sicily. Though his own force was far inferior to that of the enemy, he gained for Rome her first naval triumph, capturing 50 Carthaginian ships and transferring the sovereignty of the sea from Carthage to Rome. When the news of this naval victory reached Rome, medals were issued and a column erected in honor of this history-making event. This column was called the Columna Rostrata because it was adorned with the beaks of the ships which had been captured from the enemy. This monument was struck down by lightning between the Second and the Third Punic Wars, but a new column was erected during the reign of Emperor Claudius, and a historian writing in 1866 stated that the column "still exists in a state of partial preservation."

Later on, during the First Punic War, the Romans, with a fleet of 300 sail, under the command of Regulus and Manlius, to invade Carthaginian territory in Africa. History tells us that up to that time this was the greatest fleet that had ever left an Italian port, carrying 140,000 men. The Carthaginian fleet was equally powerful and manned by better seamen. The two fleets soon came to grips, and while fighting at a distance the Carthaginians had the advantage, to overcome which the Romans employed their grappling irons to bind the enemy's ships to their own, and in a hand-to-hand battle between the seamen the Carthaginians were defeated, their fleet dispersed, and 54 of their vessels captured by the Romans. Following this victory, the Roman Army had no difficulty in landing, but were defeated in a land battle and Regulus taken prisoner. Later the Romans lost their fleet in a storm. They built a new fleet, and because the Roman mariners were unacquainted with the Mediterranean shores, this new fleet drove upon quicksands and most of it was destroyed by storm. The lofty patriotism and tragic death of Regulus is known to every student of history. In all, four Roman fleets, one after another, were destroyed during the First Punic War.

Before the end of the First Punic War, Fabius Buteo won another naval victory by defeating a large squadron of the enemy's ships; and in a subsequent engagement Lutatius Catulus won another naval victory, capturing 120 Carthaginian ships and completely destroying for years the sea power of Carthage. Though decisively defeated on land, and starting without any worth-while fleet, the Romans built navy after navy and finally drove the Carthaginian galleys from the sea, and after 24 years' conflict brought the First Punic War to a victorious end.

Admiral Mahan, in his valuable work on the Influence of Sea Power on History, in discussing the Second Punic War and the part that naval fleets played therein, said:

> At a very conspicuous and momentous period of the world's history sea power had a strategic bearing and weight which have received scant recognition. There can not now be had the full knowledge necessary for tracing in detail its influence upon the issues of the Second Punic War, but the indications which remain are sufficient to warrant the assertion that it was the determining factor.

He further states that while the Romans by their fleets had control of the sea, yet the Carthaginian admiral in the fourth year of the Second Punic War, after the disastrous defeat at Cannæ, landed 4,000 men and a body of elephants in south Italy, and in the seventh year of that war he appeared at Tarentum to give succor to Hannibal, then in control of that city; and later Hannibal was able to transport his wasted army in a Carthaginian fleet to Carthage. Mommsen, the historian, says that at the beginning of the Second Punic War Rome controlled the sea, and to whatever cause or combination of causes it be attributed, this essentially nonmaritime state had in the First Punic War established over its seafaring rival a naval supremacy which still lasted.

In the Second Punic War there were no naval battles of importance, which Mahan considers a circumstance which in itself, and still more in connection with other well-ascertained facts, indicates a superiority analogous to that which at other epochs has been marked by the same feature.

In the Second Punic War, Hannibal crossed the Alps because his fleet was not strong enough to enable him to land his army on the Italian coast, and if he could with safety have gone by sea, he would have saved 33,000 of his veteran troops that perished in his march from Spain over the Pyrenees, Gaul, the Rhone, the Dura, and the majestic, awe-inspiring Alps, wrapped in perpetual snow, and which he crossed in midwinter in 15 days. And while Hannibal was crossing Gaul and the Alps to descend on Italy the two elder Scipios, with two divisions of the Roman fleet, were carrying one Roman army to Spain and another to Sicily to ravage Carthaginian territory. These two fleets numbered 220 ships, and each met and defeated a Carthaginian fleet.

The Third Punic War was unprovoked, and undertaken by the Romans for the unconcealed purpose of destroying Carthage, root and branch. Carthage, which at one time controlled more than 300 cities in Africa and many far-flung colonial possessions, and which was renowned for its arts, opulence, commerce, and extent of dominion, had been reduced to such extremities by its inveterate rival, Rome, that it was now in no condition to resist and, in the year 146 B. C., this flourishing city, founded 137 years before the foundation of Rome, was ruthlessly reduced to ashes.

I have the conflict between Rome and Carthage to show how easily a nation with a weak navy may sometimes defeat and destroy a nation with a strong navy. After all, the destinies of nations are not determined by armies and navies, but by higher, stronger, and nobler forces.

Talk about preparedness! Talk about having the greatest navy in the world! Have you forgotten that under the reign of Philip II of Spain, in 1588, the Spanish Armada, consisting of 131 vessels, at a time when Spain was mistress of the sea, set out to conquer England and how under Lord Howard and his little, contemptible English Navy, that splendid armada, which was the last word in navy building at that time, was destroyed, and how more than 10,000 of the sailors and soldiers on the armada were lost, and that less than 50 of the 131 vessels ever again entered a Spanish port? It was said that in every family of distinction in Spain there was mourning, because every family had lost at least one sailor or soldier on the ill-fated armada.

But some one may say that the ocean tempests had much to do with the destruction of the armada, and that is true; but the English Navy had to contend with the same storms; and, after all, the real lesson learned from this conflict is that the result of a naval battle does not depend nearly so much on the size of the respective fleets, but rather on the spirit, seamanship, initiative, courage, and resourcefulness of the men who man the ships.

Now, let us consider these modern battleships. You can take one of these battleships which costs $17,000,000, and with a bombing airplane which can be built for some $50,000 to $80,000 you can destroy the $17,000,000 battleship. It seems to me that no one who has even superficially studied naval history can contend that our national defense depends upon these ponderous battleships, because they are so easily destroyed by submarines and airplanes.

The bill under consideration (H. R. 11526) commits our Government to a three-year naval building program. It authorizes the construction of 15 cruisers at a cost not to exceed $255,000,000 and 1 aircraft carrier at a cost not to exceed $19,000,000. In the aggregate it authorizes the expenditure of $274,000,000 in the next three years. No one familiar with naval-building history expects these vessels to be built within the cost limit mentioned in the bill. Even the most unsophisticated student of public events knows that the cost of these battleships will largely exceed the estimates, and this additional cost will be met by new demands on the Public Treasury.

But if we concede for the sake of argument that these cruisers and this aircraft carrier can be built for $274,000,000, it does not follow that this bill should pass. Indeed, there is more than $274,000,000 involved in this proposal. It is my mature judgment that the passage of this bill will definitely commit our Government to a big Navy building program that will in the next few years cost the American people between one and two—yes, probably four—billion dollars.

In violation of every principle of economy, President Coolidge and Secretary Wilbur requested an authorization for 25 cruisers, 9 destroyers, 32 submarines, and 5 aircraft carriers, all to be built in the next five years, the total cost of which building program would have been $740,000,000. Later, under the nursing of Secretary Wilbur, this big Navy program grew until the expenditure of $2,000,000,000 was contemplated. Think of it, the so-called economical administration of President Coolidge, not only tolerating but actually sponsoring a battleship-building program that would burden the American people with a tax of from $740,000,000 to $2,000,000,000. I am not overstating the demands of the Navy Department, because the table prepared by that department and submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs shows a contemplated expenditure of over $4,000,000,000 if Congress had approved the first plan of the administration.

But it is argued, by those who favor this bill, that it embodies the same naval building program proposed by the representatives of the United States at the Geneva conference, and if the Geneva conference had reached an agreement it would have authorized the building of the vessels provided for in the pending measure, and in that event all opposition to the proposal embodied in this bill would disappear. This is a specious argument and begs the question. In reply, I assert that if the Geneva conference had reached an agreement and authorized this increase in our squadron of cruisers, then there might be some justification for building these ships, because it would have marked the end of our battleship building for many years. But in the absence of an international agreement limiting naval armament, the pending bill marks not the end but the beginning of a competitive naval building program that will ultimately cost the American taxpayers not merely millions but billions of dollars.

And this enormous expenditure of public funds was requested when approximately 4,000,000 men and women are out of work in the United States, either all or part time; when industrial depression is impending and about to fall; when agriculture is suffering the most acute economic distress; when farms are being sold under the hammer in foreclosure proceedings; when men who till the soil are unable to balance their budgets or sell their commodities for the cost of production; when millions of men, women, and children, unable to earn a livelihood on the farms, are flocking to the cities and great industrial centers, thereby increasing the oversupply of labor and reducing the earnings of those who toil in mills and factories; when the great basic industry of agriculture is rapidly drifting to disaster and about to be broken on the rock of insolvency; when the purchasing power of the farmer has been reduced one-half and the agrarian classes are bled white and reduced to economic vassalage; when a great vocational group is desperately struggling to escape economic ruin, the administration purposes to increase the burden under which the American people now stagger, by entering on a battleship-building program that will cost the American taxpayers at least $274,000,000 in the next three years, and what is worse, will definitely commit the Nation to a big Navy and big Army policy that will ultimately cost between one and four billion dollars.

I am not a pacifist as that term is generally understood. I would not willingly withhold one dollar that is really needed to maintain a Navy sufficient for all our national needs, but I will not allow the makers of munitions and armament to determine what is and what is not necessary for adequate preparedness.

I refuse to be stampeded by swivel-chair naval experts and those who will profit mightily by the adoption of this big Navy building program. I do not see the necessity for maintaining a large and ever-increasing Naval and Military Establishment. Such a program will not insure peace and it is more apt to provoke war. I do not make an extravagant statement when I say that in my opinion, if it were not for the activity, propaganda, and lobbying of the manufacturers of munitions, armor plate, and armament and their interlocking and affiliated interests, Congress and the American people would not now be confronted by this extravagant and unwise proposal.

Without intending to reflect in the slightest manner on my colleagues who are sponsoring this measure, I am nevertheless constrained to say that those who are behind this big Navy program are exceedingly lopsided. They can see nothing but battleships, cruisers, submarines, and aircraft carriers. They are afflicted with an aggravated case of legislative astigmatism. They are not concerned about anything except battleships, guns, and a big Naval and Military Establishment. They speak but one language, and their motto is, "Battleships and more battleships." They are not interested in the solution of the agricultural problem. They are unconcerned when grave domestic and internal conditions are being considered. Seemingly, the country can go to the "demnition bowwows" so far as they care, so long as they are permitted to put over this big Navy program. Their battle cry is, "Billions for battleships, but not one line of legislation for farm relief."

It is significant that many of the chief advocates of the big Navy building program in this House have by their votes in the past shown their unrelenting hostility to farm relief legislation. A majority of the champions of this billion-dollar battleship program are men who are the implacable enemies of all legislation designed to place agriculture on an equality with other industries. And these members will put over their battleship program even if economic justice is denied to 30,000,000 American people who directly or indirectly depend on agriculture for a livelihood.

Congress has enacted laws to stabilize the manufacturing, business, financial, and transportation interests and artificially to stimulate their profits and prosperity, but when the American farmers ask a hearing the door of the White House and the doors of Congress are slammed in their faces. From all indications the administration and Republican leaders in Congress do not intend to permit the enactment of any real, worth-while legislation in the interest of agriculture at this session, and at no future session if they can prevent it. The industrial East is in the saddle, booted and spurred, riding the agricultural West to irretrievable disaster.

I wonder how long the millions of Democratic and Republican farmers in the West will tamely submit to the arrogant dictation of the beneficiaries of special privilege in the industrial East. I wonder how long the toiling millions of common people in this Nation will supinely submit to the New England school of political thought that builds up one section at the expense of another section; that enriches one class of people at the expense of other classes; that levies a tribute and tax on the farmer for the benefit of the manufacturer and denies to the agricultural classes a fair chance and equal opportunity in the race for gain.

Gentlemen, Congress has been in session since the 5th of December, and the Republican leaders who control Congress have not done a thing to solve the agricultural problem or improve the condition of the American farmers. No constructive legislation for the benefit of agriculture has been reported out by any committee, and you have given us no opportunity to discuss and vote for legislation that will help lift unjust economic and legislative handicaps from the backs of the American farmer. It seems that it is the plan of the party in power to vote billions for naval and military purposes but deny to the agricultural classes the economic equality and legislative favor and consideration so unstintingly granted to other vocational groups.

I am, therefore, opposed to the pending bill for the reasons stated and for the following additional reasons:

(a) Surface warships are rapidly becoming obsolete. The rapid development of aircraft and submarines will soon render these ponderous warships useless. These massive battleships can not escape the swiftly moving airplane and the stealthy submarine. Suddenly out of the clouds dashes a bombing airplane, and in a few minutes the big battleship is disabled or sunk. Traveling beneath the surface of the ocean, moving silently and unobserved, the crafty submarine creeps up on a bulky battleship and launches a torpedo that rips through the guts of the armored leviathan and sends it to the bottom of the sea. If this Nation should ever be cursed with another war, the big battleships will not play an important part in the conflict, because surface battleships will be as helpless and as much at the mercy of airplanes and submarines as the short-legged, slow-moving hippopotamus would be at the mercy of a swordfish, shark, or a Spanish matador. A battleship costing $19,000,000 can easily be put out of commission by a little submarine costing only a fraction of this sum, or a bombing airplane that costs $50,000 or less. It is supreme folly for us to build our national defense around surface battleships.

(b) The times are not propitious for us to initiate a big battleship building program. Economic conditions throughout the United States persuasively suggest that we defer and avoid this enormous tax burden, at least until business conditions improve and until the buying power of our 30,000,000 agricultural population is brought to more normal levels. Until there is a rehabilitation of agriculture, the largest single group of our population, this extravagant Navy building program may well be deferred, if not permanently abandoned. Our international relations are not complicated and there is not even the remotest possibility of a war with any nation, except the little private war that President Coolidge is conducting in Nicaragua without having consulted the American people about it.

(c) I am also opposed to this bill because it is not a well-balanced, well-considered legislative proposal. Its adoption will invite—yes, compel—other nations to engage in similar big battleship building programs and we will be drawn into a race to see which nation can spend the most money for battleships, and the American taxpayer will foot the bill. This bill will give the munition makers, armament makers, and industrial interests just what they want and when they want it, while on the other hand those who are in control of Congress and the White House have so far denied to the agricultural classes the poor privilege of having their claims considered, much less acted upon.

(b) Before the proponents of a big Navy can hope to have the sympathetic consideration of the Members of Congress from the great agricultural sections, they must give the West a square deal. Agriculture must be placed on an equality with other industries to the end that the American farmer may escape peasantry and to an equitable extent share in the new wealth that annually accrues to the American people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BACON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11526 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I just want to point out that up to the present time in the debate on the naval bill there has been not one man who has been permitted to speak to advocate the President's program.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Are we to understand that the representative of Al Smith is behind the President's program?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I have to plead guilty to being the only one to defend him.

EXTRACTS OF SPEECHES

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to consent granted, I am herewith reprinting extracts from speeches delivered by me at different times in the House of Representatives, together with record showing action taken on certain legislation.

NEED OF ECONOMY

During the war great expenditures were absolutely necessary, but in the future I expect to vote to reduce the expenses of government in every way possible. In many instances appropriations can be reduced, and in some cases entirely eliminated. Since the signing of the armistice I have voted against a great many of the appropriation items simply because I recognize the necessity of rigid economy. The people have a right to expect these appropriations to be "cut to the limit," and I for one expect to continue to vote with this end in view. Such a policy will lighten the burdens which this as well as every other nation which engaged in the war must carry. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 24, 1919, p. 1710.)

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES to abolish the Council of National Defense

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think this is an absolutely useless appropriation.

What is the purpose of the Council of National Defense? All of the essentials of its contemplated work for the future can be done by other departments of this Government. Why perpetuate a duplication of activities?

Mr. BUTLER. Do the hearings disclose what service has been performed by the Council of National Defense?

Mr. JONES. The hearings disclose that the Council of National Defense during the war aided materially in getting information and in helping to put the country in a proper condition for national defense. But the Secretary of War says now that he wants to continue the work along different lines. He says that great lessons should be learned from the war, and that we should have somebody to brood over these things with an imaginative mind. This Congress should get down to brass tacks and appropriate only for those things in the maintenance of the Government that are absolutely necessary and do away with useless extravagance of every kind and character. There is no reason at all for maintaining a separate lot of clerks in Washington under a man with an imaginative mind who can draw some lessons from our experience in the late war. Somehow, somewhere, we must cut down appropriations. Economy must be the motto from this hour. This bureau should wind up its work. The American people are capable of drawing their own lessons from the war. They can do it with a good deal less brooding than the proposed director would do. [Applause.]

The amendment was agreed to, and the bureau was abolished. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 3, 1921, p. 898.)

DEPORTATION OF UNDESIRABLE ALIENS

On the proposal to raise a $6,000,000 fund to erect a monument to Theodore Roosevelt

Mr. JONES. I desire to submit that inasmuch as ex-President Roosevelt typified virile American citizenship and preached the doctrine of red-blooded Americanism, it would be better to use the proposed fund in stamping out Bolshevism and in deporting those foreign believers in and followers of the red flag. [Applause.] This would be a finer monument to the man who has been termed the "typical American" than any monument of stone or structure that might be erected, no matter how beautiful its form or how polished its surface.

I believe in freedom of speech and freedom of thought. But when a man comes to this country from some other land, and finding that he can not convince by persuasive methods the people of the United States that his doctrines are true, takes a bomb or some other sort of missile and tries to force an unwilling people to accept his doctrine, he is unpatriotic, un-American, and undesirable. [Applause.] He should be deported, along with all the others of his class, and given a chance on some island or somewhere else, where such characters can live together and try out their absurd doctrines on each other, and not be left in a country that has grown great and powerful in recognition of law and constitutional rights.

There has never been a time in the history of this Government when so many radical and revolutionary doctrines were being taught as now. These are being taught by men who believe in no flag except the red flag.

It is all right for any man to give his views so long as he depends upon reason and persuasion, but when he wants to get a hand ax and a torch and pillage and destroy he becomes a most dangerous character in a free Republic. [Applause.] (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, October 27, 1919, pp. 7587–7588.)

IMMIGRATION

* * * I am in favor of a law which will keep out the flood tide of bolshevists, anarchists, and bomb throwers, who are anxious to spread their poisonous doctrines throughout this country. If a bill is not passed millions of immigrants will sweep over this land and our institutions as well as form of Government will be in danger * * *. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 11, 1920, p. 229.)

Just now, when the Old World is in turmoil, debt burdened, and in some instances despairing, we can not take on an unlimited load of foreign immigration. This bill is already liberal enough without leaving a loophole that would admit any cunning schemer who may have caused political unrest in his own country. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 22, 1921, p. 588.)

Pending amendment to discontinue efforts of department to find a substitute for leather

Mr. Chairman, I represent a district that has a great many cattle, and last year thousands of carcasses went unskinned simply because the carcasses were not worth the skinning; these hides would not bring enough to justify the skinning of the carcass. It seems to me that it would not be worth while for the Government to spend money trying to develop the making of leather from some other sources. Why spend money to make leather from shark hides when cow hides are going to waste? Why spend Government funds to develop a substitute for a raw material that is already selling for a song? This is a good place to practice economy by eliminating waste.

The amendment was adopted. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 6, 1921, p. 1066.)

MINORS IN THE NAVY

The next business was the bill (H. R. 8183 by Mr. JONES) to authorize the discharge of any person under 21 years of age enlisting in the naval service or Marine Corps without the written consent of the parent or guardian.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. JONES. In civilian life the boy is under control of his parents until he is 21 years of age. The business concerns of this, the greatest Nation in the world, have adjusted themselves to this fact. That much has been conceded to the home training which every boy should have. Surely the great American Navy should not find it necessary to enter the home before the boy becomes of age.

The proposition is that you cause discontent when people think you have wronged them. When a boy is enlisted under 21 years of age, without consulting his parents or without the written consent of his parents or guardian, and the Navy turns down a request for his discharge, that parent is dissatisfied because he thinks he has been wronged. His neighbors also become dissatisfied, and it all tends to create a prejudice against the Navy and tends to destroy efficiency. The interests of the Navy itself will be best served in the long run by a recognition of this just principle. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 15, 1926, pp. 4007–8.)

Passed the House. (P. 6525.)

THE PRODUCER

There are those who balk when it comes to enacting legislation that has for its primary purpose the furtherance of the interest of agriculture. There are those who smile knowingly and even cynically when anyone assumes to speak in behalf of the producers of the basic wealth of the Nation. But I want to say to you that all the boasted industrial wealth of the United States, all the wheeling spindles of the factories that sing by the streams of this broad, big country, all the skyscrapers that mark the prosperity of the Nation are alike dependent upon the ultimate success of the producer. If he fails, all must suffer. If he goes down, your industrial smokestacks will rust in idleness, the bats will occupy your factories, and gloom will settle over the commerce of the Nation. The prosperity of the farmers and the manufacturers are inextricably interwoven with the success of the Nation. If the producer prospers, the entire country will ultimately flourish and success will crown the efforts of those who are industrious. [Applause.] (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, October 25, 1921.)

LIMITATION ON NEW TAX LEVIES

If we allow three years for the Government officials to review the taxpayer's return and let him know if there is to be an additional levy and how much he will probably have to pay, we are allowing them long enough. I do not see any reason why it should be necessary for the Government to wait four or five years to review the income-tax report of an individual after he has allowed his figures to get away, after some of his books are lost or destroyed, after his memory of things has faded to some degree. I do not see why it should be easier or better or cheaper for the employees of the Income Tax Bureau to review it several years later. It ought to require the same length of time to review it at one time as another. Every year additional reports must be filed. They, too, must be reviewed. So why can they not keep up as they go along? This would be far simpler and make it easier on both the Government and the taxpayer. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 15, 1925, p. 895.)

RURAL ROUTES

I live in a district that has 53 counties and which has nearly doubled in population in the last three years. Great ranches are being cut up and sold to actual settlers. Last fall on the South Plains I met many farmers who wanted an extension of rural routes. I would write the department, and the invariable reply was that, while the proposal met all the requirements, the department was out of funds—that the funds had been exhausted. Some men living 15 or 25 miles from the post office need their mail just as much as people who live in the city. [Applause.] This year there are men who live on the South Plains—farmers who will not use the rural route because the service is only twice a week, and they prefer to go to town and get their mail. It seems to me that this is a condition that should not be allowed to prevail.

I want to make one plea for the man in the far-away sections of the country, who asks little of his Government and who is always loyal to its interests. He toils away in comparative silence, but contributes to the wealth of this great Nation—yes, he in large measure supports it. The amount that is asked is small, and yet the service rendered is a very valuable contribution to good citizenship. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 22, 1925, p. 1378.)

DEALING IN FUTURES

I have never thought that pure gambling where no delivery is contemplated, is necessary to a market for agricultural products. * * * These men gamble on the bread supply of the Nation. They do not produce wheat. They do not buy actual wheat, and they do not sell actual wheat. The same is true of cotton.

There were sold on the market in Chicago annually during the five years from 1914 to 1918 about 18,000,000,000 bushels of grain. There were delivered on that market about 325,000,000 bushels. In other words, there was sold on that market fifty-one times the amount of actual grain that was delivered. There was sold annually on that market during that period about three times as much grain as was grown in the world. I do not believe it is necessary in the economy of this country to have a lot of men supported—and the country must, after all, support them—who stand in the wheat pit and who stand in the exchange and engage in purely gambling transactions. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 11, 1921, p. 1317.)

THE RADIO BILL

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas, authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to cancel the license of any person or corporation monopolizing or seeking to monopolize radio communication through the control of the manufacture or sale of radio apparatus, or by other means.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I think the committee should accept this amendment. I am seeking to give the Secretary the right to cancel the license issued to a company or corporation in the event of an effort to secure a monopoly. It is just as natural for a man to look after his own interests and for a corporation to look after its own interests as it is for sparks to fly upward. If given the opportunity companies will seek to secure a monopoly, and a monopoly in this growing line of endeavor would have tremendous power. It would have an unfair power and be able to put independent competitors out of business.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Unless somebody desires to discuss the amendment further, I think I am authorized to say the committee will agree to it.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 31, 1923, p. 2783.)

RELIEF FUND

The House had under consideration a bill providing that the United States should furnish grain and other foodstuffs for the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany. Mr. JONES of Texas offered the following amendment:

"Provided further, That in purchasing such grain and other foodstuffs as are herein provided for preference shall be given wherever practicable to purchase from farmers and cooperative organizations of the farmers."

Mr. JONES. I regret that I can not support the bill. I believe we are trustees for other people's money and that we have not the right to vote funds out of the Treasury for other than governmental purposes.

However, the temper of the House indicates a determination to pass the measure, and if it is to be passed I do not see why anyone should object to giving preference to cooperative organizations in making purchases. There are many cooperative organizations which have millions of bushels of wheat. They are struggling to better the condition of the farmers. There is other wheat in the hands of speculators, and it seems to me that while it is being done these organizations and the farmers themselves should be favored in every possible way.

There is a surplus of wheat in this country. There always is a surplus of wheat. Somebody must ship that wheat away. The United States Government is going to do that if this resolution should pass. Do you gentlemen prefer that the Government should buy from speculators or from the farmers? Do you object to the Government buying from cooperative organizations? We have wheat growers' associations all over the United States. There is the Northwestern Wheat Growers Association, there is the Texas Wheat Growers Association, and a number of others that have wheat that they must dispose of somewhere, and, while doing this, why not give them the benefit of it?

Why should the Government go out and buy from some speculator when there are cooperative associations all over the country which have surplus products in their hands? Why not give them relief?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES) there were—ayes 165, noes 68. So the amendment was agreed to. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 24, 1924, p. 4860.)

COTTON GRADES

A bill (H. R. 15539) by Mr. JONES to provide for a report on the grades and quality of cotton in the carry-over

Mr. JONES. The measure provides for a report on the grades and staple of cotton on hand and known as the carry-over. During the last few years a considerable amount of nonmerchantable cotton has accumulated. Naturally when all of this nonusable cotton is bulked together with the good cotton in the department's estimate of the carry-over it tends to depress the market. To correct this damage that has heretofore been done is the third purpose of the bill.

The measure passed the House of Representatives January 17, 1927. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1786.) It was later merged with Senate bill 4746 and the joint measure became a law March 3, 1927.

TAKING THE PROFITS OUT OF WAR

Many millionaires were made by the World War. Many others were made rich. The morning after the war was declared the munitions makers and those engaged in making the essentials of war were much better off financially than they were the night before.

When the Government wanted men for the military and naval service it simply listed the young manhood of the Nation and called it into service on its own terms.

Why should not the same method have been used with reference to the property and plants of those engaged in the manufacture of all of the supplies essential to the waging of that war? [Applause.]

A law should be enacted now, to be made automatically operative upon the declaration of war, whereby, when young men are drafted, the essential industries, munitions, plants, and all factories engaged in manufacturing the supplies of war, shall also be subject to draft on the Nation's own terms just like the manhood of the country. [Applause.]

Much has been said in recent years about various plans to promote world peace. Numerous plans have been suggested, nearly all of them having something of merit and all of them evidencing a desire to lessen the chance of war. But do you know what I think would do more than any or all of these plans? Simply take the profits out of war. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 10, 1924.)

The House had under consideration an amendment offered by Mr. JONES forbidding the Department of Agriculture to issue forecasts of future cotton prices

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee should accept this amendment. It means much to the people of the South. Last fall cotton was on the upward trend. Here is a report in the Dallas Morning News of September 15, 1927, giving the market: "Cotton soars $3 per bale. Late dealings bring gain of $6.50 over Tuesday's low mark." A forecast of lower prices was then given out by the department. What was the result?

The Dallas News of September 16, 1927, giving an account of the market the day after this price forecast was issued, contains the following statement: "Market disrupted. Decline. In other words, the market tumbled several dollars per bale, causing great losses to cotton growers of $7.50 per bale in New York as New Orleans protested." * * * I think the issuing of a forecast at that time was a great blunder. The department can and should give to the public all the facts—the production, the weather conditions, the acreage, and all other facts—but it should not give conclusions or guesses as to prices or the price trend.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 62, noes 48. So the amendment was agreed to. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 2, 1928, p. 4106.)

A bill (H. R. 11579, by Mr. JONES) relating to investigation of new uses for cotton

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, a measure which I introduced last year, containing substantially the provisions of this bill, passed the House during the last session, but died on the Senate Calendar. While the measure last year was pending provision was made in the appropriation bill for the beginning of the work.

Under this provision much valuable work has already been done. Experiments are being conducted in the making of brattice cloth for use instead of jute, in the use of cotton materials in conduit installation, in the better finishing of fabrics so as to make them more suitable for use, in the use of bagging for cotton, the making of sugar sacks and other wrappings, and the blending of cotton with other materials in the making of many useful articles. Surely the House does not want this work discontinued.

During recent years most of the attention has been paid to the problems of production. Too little attention has been paid to the problems of distribution. Just now the problem of distribution is a far more vital one. Every thinking man must admit this. The work contemplated by this measure applies to this phase of the problem.

In other words, it furthers the effort toward stimulating the consumption of cotton and its by-products. Anything that will do this will help to solve its marketing and disposition, and would, of course, be reflected in a better price for producers of the commodity.

I don't think this Congress could do a finer thing for this great industry. The work costs but little and means much to the cotton producers of the South.

The bill was engrossed, read a third time, and passed. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 7, 1928, p. 4379.)

DEATH OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM KENT

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I regret to announce the death of my predecessor in Congress, the Hon. William Kent. At this time I do not desire to take up the time of the House, but I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce to the House the death of Hon. William Kent, my predecessor in Congress. He served here in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses, when he voluntarily retired to private life.

Mr. Kent had three outstanding qualities that particularly distinguished his career as a man and as a public servant. The first of these qualities was benevolence. His personal fortune freed him from any harassing concern so far as the financial needs of himself and his family were involved. Yet, never was he indifferent to or unmindful of the problems of poverty and misfortune that beset so many of his fellow men. His private life was full of concern and acts of kindness and charity for the misfortunes of others. All his benevolent efforts were accompanied by a becoming modesty, frequently approaching concealment.

He gave Muir Woods, a large attractive recreation area, conveniently accessible to San Francisco, for the use of the public forever. Countless thousands enjoy this gift annually. He refused to permit his name to be identified with the name of this park. At great expense he acquired an area of magnificent redwoods in Humboldt County, Calif., to be preserved forever for the inspiration and enjoyment of the public. The area given is not associated with his name, except by a small bronze tablet on the face of a native bowlder, screened by the undergrowth, shades, and foliage of a primeval forest.

The other two outstanding qualities of Mr. Kent distinguished his public service. The first of these qualities was his independence. He never sought the easy way of public promotion by subordinating his own convictions and purposes to organization programs and policies. He was a free thinker and a free actor. He carried to the public service his own untrammelled brain and heart to a remarkable degree. He was an original thinker and strong in his own convictions. The mere suggestion of surrendering his own convictions to conform to organization or party purposes was repellant to him. That was a form of mental and moral servitude to which he instinctively rebelled. He was neither qualified by experience, disposition, nor conviction for team work with political organizations or parties. His loyalty was to causes and not to instrumentalities.

The other distinguishing quality of Mr. Kent, so far as his public service was concerned, was his fidelity to the public interests as he viewed them. He had private financial interests ordinarily sufficient to consciously or unconsciously dominate the viewpoint of men. His freedom from such domination and his public efforts against his own personal interests were pretty generally conceded as typical of his career.

Men are attracted to the public service from different motives. To some, it may selfishly appeal only as a means of self-promotion and a way to honor, prestige, and power—a way to gratify the vanity of a selfish, designing man. The public service may appeal to the idealist as a place of self-sacrifice, an opportunity of service to others, a means of doing good to one's fellowman and to his country. Without something of that idealism, it is unfortunate that any man should be promoted to high public place. It is too much to expect that our public men shall be inspired by this high idealism alone. Between these extreme viewpoints there is a practical field in which, perhaps, most public officers are found. Public life appeals as a worthy field for advancement and happiness and also, I am convinced, to a great degree, as an opportunity of usefulness and service to our fellows and our country. Mr. Kent had the idealism of public loyalty to an unusual degree.

The strong convictions of Mr. Kent and the vigor with which he espoused them aroused positive likes and dislikes. Frequently the wisdom of his proposals was assailed, but, whether agreeing or disagreeing with him, those who knew him have conceded to him the three great qualities I have assigned him to-day.

SENATE

FRIDAY, March 16, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who hast committed to us the swift and solemn trust of life, since we know not what a day may bring forth, but only that the hour for serving Thee is always present, may we wake to the instant claims of Thy holy will, not waiting for to-morrow, but yielding ourselves to-day. Consecrate with Thy presence the way our feet may go, and the humblest work will shine and the roughest place be made plain. Let Thy fatherly goodness be upon all Thy children; and do Thou remember in loving pity all who are destitute and homeless, whose burdens Thou hast called on us to share. Though they be troubled and distressed on every side, save them from the anguish of despair and suffer them not to fall from Thee. Grant this, O Lord, through Him whom Thou hast sent to bear our griefs and carry our sorrows, Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had concurred in the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) appointing a committee to represent Congress at the exercises at Atlanta, Ga., incident to the unveiling of a portion of the Stone Mountain monument.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 2569. An act providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the semiarid or dry-land regions of the United States; and

S. 3292. An act providing for turning over to the Ohio State Archæological and Historical Society two dedication stones formerly a part of one of the locks of the Ohio & Erie Canal.

PRESIDENT'S LETTER TO GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the letter appearing in the morning papers from the President to the Governor of Porto Rico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of President Coolidge's letter to the Governor of Porto Rico was as follows:

[From the New York Times, Friday, March 16, 1928]

Hon. HORACE M. TOWNER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR GOVERNOR: I desire to acknowledge the concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Porto Rico committed to Colonel Lindbergh on his visit to San Juan, and also a cablegram, dated January 19, signed by Messrs. Barcelo and Tous Soto, the president of the Senate and speaker of the House of Representatives of Porto Rico, respectively.

The cablegram and resolution seem to be based largely on a complete misunderstanding of concrete facts. It would not be difficult to show that the present status of Porto Rico is far more liberal than any status of its entire history; that its people have greater control of their own affairs with less interference from without; that its people enjoy liberty and the protection of law, and that its people and its Government are receiving material assistance through its association with the continental United States. The treaty of Paris, of course, contains no promise to the people of Porto Rico. No phrase of that treaty contemplated the extension to Porto Rico of a more liberal régime than existed. The United States has made no promise to the people of Porto Rico that has not been fulfilled, nor has any representative or spokesman for the United States made such a promise.

OUR OWN STATES NOT SO FREE

The Porto Rican government at present exercises a greater degree of sovereignty over its own internal affairs than does the government of any State or Territory of the United States. Without admitting the existence of "a grave economical situation" in the finances of the government of Porto Rico, the present difficulty, which it is hoped is but temporary, is exclusively the result of the exercise by the elected representatives of the people of Porto Rico of an authority granted by the present very liberal organic law. The responsibility of the United States, as distinguished from that of Porto Rico, is, at most, that officers appointed by the President into Porto Rico may not have exercised power legally placed in their hands to veto or make ineffective acts of the Porto Rican Legislature.

The cablegram complains that—

"Ours is the only Spanish-American country whose voice has not been heard at Habana during the Pan-American Conference, for it was not represented there."

This is a most serious error and is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the relation of Porto Rico to the United States. No State or Territory of the Union was represented as such at Habana, but the representation of the United States in Habana represents Porto Rico as truly as it represents any part of the territory of the United States.

PEOPLE HAVE FULL CITIZENSHIP

The request is made that Porto Rico be constituted as a "free State," and not "a mere subjected colony." Certainly giving Porto Rico greater liberty than it has ever enjoyed and powers of government for the exercise of which its people are barely prepared can not, with propriety, be said to be establishing therein "a mere subjected colony." The people of Porto Rico are citizens of the United States, with all the rights and privileges of other citizens of the United States, and these privileges are those which we invoked "when declaring for independence at the memorable convention at Philadelphia."

In answering the cablegram it might be well to consider briefly the conditions and tendencies we found in Porto Rico and what the situation in Porto Rico is to-day as well as the steps we are responsible for in Porto Rico to better conditions as we found them and as they exist to-day.

There is no conflict of opinion as to the condition in which we found Porto Rico. Perhaps the best authority on local conditions was Dr. Cayetano Coll y Teste, who, in an article published in Porto Rico in 1897, after describing the progress in Porto Rico for 100 years ending with that year, thus describes the great body of the population of Porto Rico:

"Only the laborer, the son of our fields, one of the most unfortunate beings in the world, with a pale face, bare feet, lean body, ragged clothing, and feverish look, walks indifferently, with the shadows of ignorance in his eyes, dreaming of the cockfights, the shuffle of the cards, or the prize in the provincial lottery. No, it is not possible that the tropical zone produces such organic anemia; this lethargy of body and soul is the offspring of moral and physical vices that drag down the spirit and lead our peasants to such a state of social degradation. In the miserable cabin, hung on a peak like a swallow's nest, this unhappy little creature comes into the world; when it opens its eyes to the light of reason it does not hear the village bell reminding him to lift his soul to the Divine One and render homage to the Creator of Worlds; he hears only the hoarse cry of the cock crowing in the early morning, and then he longs for the coming of Sunday to witness the strife and knavery of the cockfights. When a man, he takes up with the first woman to be found in the neighborhood and makes her his mistress to gratify his amorous lusts. In the wretched tavern the food he finds is only the putrid salt meat, codfish filled with rotten red spots, and India rice, and the man who harvests the best coffee in the world, who helps to gather into the troughs the sweetest grains of nature, and takes to pasture in the fields and meadows the beautiful calves, can not raise to his lips the bit of meat, because the municipal tax places it out of his reach and almost duplicates the price of the tainted codfish; coffee becomes to him an article of luxury through its high price, and of sugar he can only taste that filled with molasses and impurities. * * * This eternal groan of the Porto Rican laborers is an infirmity of our present-day society and consequently it is necessary to study it and remedy it."

That the accuracy of this description was appreciated in Porto Rico was evidenced by the fact that it was awarded a prize from the Economic Society of Friends of the Country.

Other contemporary testimony of prominent Porto Ricans to the same general effect is not lacking, but space forbids its inclusion.

CONDITION OF LONG STANDING

Were this pitiable economic condition the result of a passing depression the situation would have been less hopeless, but the evidence is clear that the condition was one of long standing and that the tendency was to get worse rather than to improve. One would look in vain for a single ray of hope if Porto Rico were to continue its normal course as we found it. Health and sanitation, education and public works, were such as naturally accompanied the situation of the people pictured.

Prior to the American occupation the Porto Rican people had received practically no training in self-government or the free exercise of the franchise. While there existed a body of educated, intelligent men, the great mass of the people were without experience or training in self-government, and only a small percentage could qualify as voters under very broad electoral qualifications.

The military government in its brief existence of 18 months accomplished the following:

1. Order was reestablished and an insular police force organized.

2. The more obvious burdens of taxation as they fell on the very poor people were abolished, and a careful study made by an expert preparatory to the adoption of a proper revenue system for the island.

3. Such changes in the judicial system were made as were necessary to bring that system more in accordance with American procedure and with the American view of individual rights and liberty.

4. A department of education was established; boards of health were organized; the public works were reorganized and progress in road building was greater than in all the previous history of Porto Rico.

And finally the government was reorganized in accordance with the act passed by Congress to establish a civil government in order that there might be a minimum of friction in changing from the military to the civil government.

Experience has shown that this organic act, though intended to be temporary, was quite up to the standard of such acts, and that it gave to the people of Porto Rico a liberal form of government under which they could acquire experience in democratic government honestly administered and could enjoy all of the rights and privileges to which we are accustomed. Under it the possibility of development was great, and this possibility was realized.

THE PRESENT STATUS OF PORTO RICO

Congress, recognizing the progress in Porto Rico, enacted in 1917 the present organic law. Under this law the Porto Rican people were made citizens of the United States. All of the guarantees of the Constitution are extended to Porto Rico, or the Legislature of Porto Rico is granted authority to make effective those guarantees not specifically extended.

The great satisfaction in Porto Rico at the passage of this act is the best evidence of its liberality.

The principal difference between the government of Porto Rico and that of the organized and incorporated Territories of the United States is the greater power of the legislature and the fiscal provisions governing Porto Rico, which are far more liberal than those of any of our States or Territories.

GOVERNMENT FINANCES

Through the urging of the War Department, the United States income tax of 1913 was extended to Porto Rico, with a provision authorizing the modification of the law by the local legislature and directing that the income from this source go into the insular treasury.

In the revision of the organic act of Porto Rico in 1917, the War Department, with the assistance of the governor, was enabled to secure a provision similar to the one in effect in the Philippine Islands; that is, that the internal revenue collected in the United States on Porto Rican products should be turned in to the treasury of Porto Rico. These two taxes are now carried in the returns of the revenues of Porto Rico as "United States internal revenues" and "income taxes," and together they constitute a good part of the revenues of the government.

The treasury of Porto Rico receives the customs duties collected in Porto Rico, less the cost of collection. It receives the internal-revenue taxes which are laid by its own legislature and collected in Porto Rico. It receives the income taxes which are laid by its own legislature. It receives the internal-revenue taxes collected in the United States on Porto Rican products consumed in the United States.

I have set down a few scattered facts, which, however, sufficiently show the consequences of Porto Rico's union with the United States. We found the people of Porto Rico poor and distressed, without hope for the future, ignorant, poverty-stricken, and diseased, not knowing what constituted a free and democratic government and without the experience of having participated in any government. We have progressed in the relief of poverty and distress, in the eradication of disease, and have attempted, with some success, to inculcate in the inhabitants the basic ideas of a free, democratic government. We have now in Porto Rico a government in which the participation by Americans from the United States is indeed small. We have given to the Porto Rican practically every right and privilege which we permitted ourselves to exercise. We have now progressed to the point where discouragement is replaced by hope, and while only 30 years ago one was indeed an optimist to see anything promising in Porto Rico, to-day one is indeed a pessimist who can see any reasonable human ambition beyond the horizon of its people.

PORTO RICANS AID IN PROGRESS

It is not desired to leave the impression that all progress in Porto Rico was due to continental Americans. Without the cooperation and assistance of Porto Ricans progress would indeed have been negligible, but the cooperation is largely due to the encouragement of American assistance, American methods, and an increase in the reward of efforts made.

There has been a natural hesitation to recall and dwell upon the unfortunate condition of Porto Rico in the past. There is a feeling, however, that the United States is entitled to a good name in its dealing with Porto Rico and to protect itself from any reflection on its good name. Perhaps no territory in the world has received such considerate treatment in the past 30 years as has Porto Rico, and perhaps nowhere else has progress been so marked and so apparent as in Porto Rico. We are certainly entitled to a large part of the credit for this situation.

There exists to-day in Porto Rico a department of health in all respects modern and including in its activities all branches of modern public-health work. Not of least importance as showing the marked progress in health matters in Porto Rico in recent years is the fact that it is completely manned by Porto Ricans. The improvement in the health conditions of Porto Rico is not fully indicated by the reduction in death rate alone, though this rate had been almost divided by two since the early days of American sovereignty of the island. The practical eradication of smallpox, which had existed continuously in the island for more than 40 years and which had resulted in more than 600 deaths annually for the last 10 years prior to American sovereignty; the diagnosis of the so-called tropical "anemia" which affected the great bulk of the population of Porto Rico; the discoveries in Cuba in the method of propagating yellow fever, were concrete benefits to the health situation in Porto Rico and have been of continuous benefit.

EDUCATION AND HEALTH

The history of education in Porto Rico prior to its occupation by the United States is very largely the history of individual effort. Individuals of character and determination would establish and conduct a school, and it would generally disappear with the persons establishing it. Governmental efforts likewise lacked continuity. About the year 1860 a more determined governmental effort was made, and in 1898 the maximum enrollment in the public schools and private schools was 29,182, which has increased to 213,321. The per capita expenditure for public education in Porto Rico has increased during the period of American sovereignty from 30 cents per annum to approximately $4 per annum. The number of government-owned public-school buildings has increased from none to 991. The Department of Health and the Department of Education of Porto Rico are combining to make of the Porto Ricans of the future a different type physically and mentally from those we found in Porto Rico.

Not because they are entitled to first consideration, but because they are so readily measured and would be of fundamental importance in any change of status, it may be well briefly to recall some of the direct financial advantages to Porto Rico accruing from its relation to the United States.

Porto Rico pays no tax to the United States Treasury. The Federal services in Porto Rico are supported from the United States Treasury.

The services which benefit directly and financially the people of Porto Rico are the Lighthouse Service, the agricultural experiment station, and financial assistance to the College of Agriculture, the maintenance of the Porto Rico Regiment of the Army, the activities of the Veterans' Bureau, and Federal participation in harbor improvements. In a more general way, Porto Rico receives the protection of the Army and Navy and the service of the Department of State and its diplomatic and consular service.

$5,000,000 EXPENDED ANNUALLY

The expenditure from the United States accruing directly to the people of Porto Rico is not less than $5,000,000 per annum.

In the fiscal year 1927 the total operating revenue of Porto Rico was $11,191,893.11. Of this total the following, in our States and Territories, would not accrue to the local treasury:

Customs	$1,806,567.91
Income taxes	1,565,745.98
United States internal revenue	440,660.71
Total	3,812,964.60
Excise taxes (which would in great part not accrue to local treasury)	5,701,502.33
Total	9,514,466.93

It will be observed, therefore, that had we not given special and very considerate attention to its needs, but had treated Porto Rico as we have treated the incorporated Territory of the United States, of the more than $11,000,000 subject to appropriation by the elected Legislature of Porto Rico there would have been not to exceed $2,000,000 available.

The United States tariff extends to Porto Rico, and no part—certainly no agricultural part—of our territory is so favored by its tariff. And the striking development of Porto Rico under American sovereignty as shown by the growth of imports and exports is, in a material part, due to this favorable tariff treatment of its products.

INCREASED EXPORTS

The total exports from Porto Rico in the last complete years of Spanish sovereignty were $11,555,962. In the fiscal year 1927 this total was $108,067,434. The total imports in the last Spanish year were $10,725,563, and in 1927 were $98,810,750.

Comparing this with one of the most prosperous, wholly independent neighbors of Porto Rico, we find that in the period in which the exterior trade of Porto Rico has been multiplied by nine that of its neighbor has been multiplied by less than seven.

The total value of Porto Rican products shipped to the United States in the fiscal year was $97,823,523, and of this total $97,000,000 was highly protected in the American market. The total purchase by Porto Rico in the markets of the United States in the same calendar year was $87,046,319. For a number of years Cuba has been the largest purchaser of Porto Rican coffee, which is given a 20 per cent reduction of the Cuban tariff as an American product, not because Cuba sells to Porto Rico but because Cuba sells to the United States.

The advantage of the United States market to Porto Rico can the better be appreciated when it is noted that of the $97,000,000 of Porto Rican products sold in the last calendar year into the United States there would have been imposed, had these products come from countries not enjoying free admission into the United States, a duty of approximately $57,000,000.

On the products from the continental United States entering Porto Rico during the same period the duty imposed, had they come from a foreign country, would have been less than one-third of this amount. Certainly Porto Rico would not desire reciprocity to be more favorable to it.

The bonded indebtedness of Porto Rico is $25,555,000, and that of the municipalities of Porto Rico $18,772,000. These bonds are practically all held in the United States. Due to the fact that these bonds are tax exempt by a United States statute, Porto Rico pays in annual interest at least 2 per cent less than would otherwise be paid—a saving of approximately $886,540 annually.

GREATER AUTONOMY OF NO USE

In what way, by a greater grant of autonomy, could Porto Rico so look after the market for its products or the market for its bonds, or in what way could it improve the economic position of its government or its people?

In studying the effect of granting to Porto Rico what was requested in the cablegram sent to me, one must naturally begin with the assumption that the products of Porto Rico would be for some time approximately what they now are. The change would be in disposing of them. In the year 1926 Porto Rico sold in the United States market 1,157,000,000 pounds of sugar and received therefor $48,200,000. A near neighbor sold an equal quantity of sugar for $22,800,000. Porto Rico sold in the United States in the same year 20,500,000 pounds of leaf tobacco for $13,000,000. Its neighbor sold an equal quantity of leaf tobacco for $1,192,000. In the sale of tobacco the element of quality enters, but these numbers sufficiently show the effect of the free entry to the United States market on the two principal products of the island, and show the extent to which the funds now used to make its purchases abroad and to meet its indebtedness abroad would shrink if the privilege were withdrawn. This shrinkage must be followed by a corresponding shrinkage in the revenues that go to support the activities in Porto Rico which mean progress for the future.

There is no disposition in America, and certainly not on my part, to discourage any reasonable aspiration of the people of Porto Rico. The island has so improved and its people have so progressed in the last generation as to justify high hopes for the future; but it certainly is not unreasonable to ask that those who speak for Porto Rico limit their petition to those things which may be granted without a denial of such hope. Nor is it unreasonable to suggest that the people of Porto Rico, who are a part of the people of the United States, will progress with the people of the United States rather than isolated from the source from which they have received practically their only hope of progress.

Sincerely yours,

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I realize that without unanimous consent during the morning hour I would not be allowed to speak. I would like to proceed for a few moments. I am not going to talk more than five or six minutes, I think, and I would like to do so at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. During the debate on the Muscle Shoals proposition I called attention at one time to a telegram which I had received from Athens, Ala., stating that if the joint resolution which was then pending were passed and became a law, Athens would build a transmission line to Muscle Shoals. My attention has been called to the fact by a citizen of Athens that there is now pending before the people of Athens a proposition to sell their municipal plant to the Alabama Power Co., and this citizen of Athens, Miss Susan Lawrence Davis, a voter there and a resident of Athens, who has lived there for a great many years, sends to me a letter, which I hold in my hand, written to her by the attorney of the Alabama Power Co.

It is a very fine letter; but I submitted it this morning to an expert, and he tells me it is a mimeographed letter, that the only thing in the letter written directly by the typewriter is her name and address. It is signed with pen and ink by W. T. Saunders, a member of the law firm of Saunders & Woodruff, of Athens, Ala. So I assume that this letter has been sent to all the citizens and voters of Athens. I want to read a little of it, in which the attorney for the company sets out so patriotically his interest in Athens and how that is subservient and secondary to his duty as an attorney for the Alabama Power Co. He said:

DEAR MISS DAVIS: On Monday, March 26, the qualified voters of Athens will be asked to express with their ballot a choice between retaining the lighting plant and distribution system or disposing of them to the Alabama Power Co. for a consideration of $113,000. (The water system is not included.)

First, I want to make clear my position in the matter. I am the regularly retained legal counsel for the power company, but in selling my legal services I did not relinquish any of my citizenship ties. I am now as much interested in the welfare and progress of the community I love and in which I first saw the light of day as I was before becoming connected with those who would purchase the property. Too, my personal holdings and those of my family are at stake, and as self-preservation is the first law of nature I naturally would not advocate the sale of the power plant if I honestly believed that to do so would in any way work a hardship on my community and jeopardize the enhancement in value of my family's interests. My interest and my family's interest in Athens are far more important to my future happiness and welfare than my professional connection with any single client, and I say this without the slightest attempt to belittle or in any degree reflect upon those I serve in a legal capacity.

Having thus established his patriotism and his interest, which are above everything else, in the beautiful city of Athens, he then proceeds for about four or five pages of typewritten matter to make an argument in favor of his client, the Alabama Power Co., trying to induce the recipients of the letter to cast their votes in favor of the Alabama Power Co.

Mr. President, I wonder if intelligent citizens and voters of that beautiful city in northern Alabama will be fooled by any bunk of this kind. The question as to whether they should sell or not sell their lighting plant and distribution system is one that I do not presume to decide or even to express an opinion upon. It is for them to determine. I have no knowledge of the local conditions and have no advice to give. But this attempt of the Alabama Power Co. to get the property is only a sample of what is going on all over the Nation. An attorney is employed. Perhaps this attorney may be employed for other reasons; I am not saying that; but an attorney influential in political matters, in financial matters, in social matters, is employed for his legal ability and for his abilty to persuade people in political matters. Here is a lawyer devoting his time to sending out a letter of this kind, I presume to every citizen and voter of that city, which must cost quite a sum of money, who first tells the voters that he is not moved by his legal employment but that he is moved entirely by his hope and his wish for the welfare of the people in that community, whom he so dearly loves according to the dollars and cents that he as an attorney at law gets from the Alabama Power Co.

Mr. President, I have no criticism to offer against the attorney who accepts as a client any corporation, none whatever against anyone who sells his legal services to the Alabama Power Co. or any other power company or any other corporation. But the attorney who, under the pretense of selling his legal services, accepts the fee and the pay to advance the political interests of his client and to control the politics of his community is selling his birthright for a mess of pottage.

We have a good deal to say against the man who sells his vote. It is a despicable thing. Such a man ought to be deprived of the right ever to cast a ballot. But we do not hear much said against the influential lawyer, the influential attorney, who, under the guise of selling his legal services, sells his duty as a citizen and tries to control through that method the rights and the duties of his fellow men.

Mr. President, right along the same line I received another letter from the superintendent of the municipal water works at Springfield, Ill. I want to read a paragraph from that letter and then a paragraph or two from a copy of a letter which he incloses. I had quoted in the debate here on Muscle Shoals something from the report of the municipal waterworks in Springfield, Ill. I stated then that the report from which I quoted was nearly a year old, but that I had seen a later report which was practically, or, I think, exactly the same. The superintendent of the waterworks in this letter calls my attention to what might be a criticism of what I have said, and I want to read that. He writes:

As to the comparisons of rates shown in our report and used by you, it is possible that some one will take issue with you and say they are not true. As a matter of fact, the Illinois Power & Light Corporation, one of the Insull group of utilities, has recently made a reduction in rates in the city of Decatur, and possibly in some other towns, on account of the example being set in Springfield. In Decatur a movement is now under way to establish a municipal plant, and about the middle of last summer this new rate was promulgated; however, I wish to say that we checked the rates in the cities used for comparison just before the report went to press. We will do likewise before our next report goes to press, which will be in about three months.

Among other things, the writer of this letter inclosed a copy of the letter which he has written to a friend of his about the newspaper situation, in which he said:

A newspaper adjunct to the electric light and power monopoly has been rapidly developing during the past two months and has, so far, reached some fifteen to twenty million dollars in magnitude. The movement is headed by Ira C. Copley, who testified before the Reed committee on campaign expenditures Wednesday, August 4, 1926, at Chicago. His testimony will be found at page 1805 in part 2 of "Senatorial campaign expenditures," pursuant to Senate Resolution 195, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session. Copley was the owner of 77 per cent of the stock of the Western United Gas & Electric Co., a utility corporation the principal service of which being electric light and power and gas, and its territory being principally in McHenry and Will Counties in northern Illinois, where about 15 cities and towns were supplied.

In addition to these utilities, Copley owned three leading newspapers circulating in the same territory, namely, the Aurora Beacon News, the Elgin Courier News, and the Joliet Herald News. These papers were used to nurse along the people and keep them contented while Copley became immensely wealthy by collecting exorbitant rates for utility service.

Further on he says:

He still owns the newspapers and has acquired some 10 or 15 others, usually paying handsome prices. His utility properties, however, have all been transferred to the Samuel Insull group.

It seems from this letter that this man is engaged in the newspaper business about as the Water Power Trust and the Electric Light Trust are engaged in buying up, wherever they can get possession and control, local companies which are owned by the municipalities supplying electricity to citizens. Further on he says:

Some two months ago he closed a deal for the Illinois State Journal of this city—

That is, Springfield, Ill.—

at a price of $900,000, which is fully $300,000 more than the property is commercially worth. A week or two later he acquired the Union and the Tribune of San Diego, owned by the Spreckels family, for which it is reported, he paid three million. He also purchased the Independent, a radical paper, which he suppressed entirely, having dismantled the plant. A few days after this he purchased a number of newspapers known as the Fred Kellogg chain—some 12 or 15 in number—and, I am informed, negotiations were under way for the purchase of the Express, one of the large papers of Los Angeles. It is rumored that this chain is to be extended up the coast, including the cities of Oakland, San Francisco, Seattle, and Tacoma. Bear in mind that this is the area in which the utility fight is the keenest! Observers in southern California are convinced that this is merely a defense measure on the part of the utility interests who are providing the funds for these purchases and thereby occupying the newspaper field to shut out possible newspaper support from the public side.

Copley is trying to make it appear that he is out of the utility business, which is absolutely untrue. You will see by reading his testimony, beginning at page 1805, that he admitted to the Reed committee that, for the most part, he received in exchange for his utility property shares in the Insull properties, and, incidentally, he confessed to having contributed $25,000 to the Smith campaign fund. When he came to Springfield I was introduced to him as being at the head of the municipal utilities of this city. I shook hands with him, saying, "And you also are in the utility business." He promptly replied, "No; I sold out." "But," said I, "you are still interested in utilities." "Well, yes," he said, "I took securities in payment for my property." Yet, a few days later, when he purchased the San Diego Union and the Tribune, he states over his own signature as follows: "These papers will not be the personal organs of myself or anyone else. I have no political ambitions. I have no connections with any public utility anywhere and no connections with any other business than the newspaper business anywhere." Yet at this very time he was still carrying the title of president in the reorganized Western United Gas & Electric Co., which, I understand, has become a Samuel Insull subsidiary.

How far this newspaper monopoly will go nobody knows; but it is, indeed, a menace, and an investigation which would show the actual financial support behind this venture would undoubtedly reveal a direct utility connection, and would be a splendid and far-reaching contribution toward the protection of the public.

I respectfully refer these particular matters to which I have referred, as to Alabama, as to Illinois and California, and as to Copley, to the Federal Trade Commission for proper investigation under the resolution which some time ago was adopted by the Senate.

ED LOCKE, NIGHT WATCHMAN

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if I may have just a moment, I desire to say that a day or two ago, on March 14, in fact, Robert Quillen, on the editorial page of the Washington Post, had this to say:

Brains alone deserve respect now—whether in an old head or a young one.

In sharp contrast with that strange and wicked philosophy I wish to read from the Washington News of the same day, March 14, a dispatch from Los Angeles, Calif.:

Ed Locke, night watchman at a switching station at the South California Edison Co., 8 miles from Saugus, hung valiantly to a telephone shouting a warning to those in the valley below. Hours later his body was found. He had stood by his post.

In this day of materialism, of corruption in politics, selfishness, and cowardice on the part of many public men it is refreshing to have brought to our attention the deed of a heroic spirit like this young man Locke. I do not know how brainy he was, but he had a principle and a love of humanity in his heart worth more than gold. He gave his life to save the lives of others. But Mr. Quillen says that "Brains only deserve respect now." I should like to suggest to this gentleman, whose writings consist of plagiarisms from Emerson, Macaulay, Carlyle, and Fields Scrap Book, the thought that there is something worth more than brilliant brains. It is well to have good sense. Mr. Lincoln said the reason God made so many of the plain people with good sound, common sense was that he loved them most. Hickman, the human fiend, had an extraordinary brain. The teachers of his early youth refer to his remarkable intellect, but he is a moral pervert and a criminal, and must go to his death for crimes against God and man before he reaches manhood's estate. Quillen and such writers of the modern day who peddle out such false philosophy ought to be condemned by all respectable people.

Mr. President, it is a noble thing to pay tribute to a man or woman of extraordinary brain power, but I submit that there are human virtues that tower in their worth to mankind above brilliance of intellect. Bacon was referred to as the "wisest, brightest, and meanest of mankind." The late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, once delivered an able and eloquent address to a graduating class of young men in which he said to them, "In all your struggles of life, in storing your mind with valuable information, in training your intellect, remember in it all and through it all that mankind is the bottom fact."

Another has said, "The man who loves his fireside best is the nation's best patriot." It is not necessary that he be a man of tremendous brain power, but the man who loves his fireside best loves those dependent upon him; is a blessing to his country and a blessing to humanity.

So we find that the deed of Ed Locke in the estimation of some, if not in the estimation of Robert Quillen, is highly prized by those who love and honor him for the noble and admirable virtues displayed by him in giving his life to save the lives of others.

Again the Bible tells us that "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." So the man who strives to have a good name is entitled to "respect."

Again, Alexander Pope has said, "An honest man's the noblest work of God." Then, certainly, an honest man is entitled to "respect." And the Scripture says: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

So, Mr. President, it is not only necessary to study and cultivate the intellect and make it as capable as it is possible to make it, but it is absolutely essential to possess noble heart qualities and be grounded in right principles. These make up the strength and lasting qualities of the Nation. An unscrupulous and unprincipled smart man is an undesirable and dangerous citizen.

So brains, unless they are backed by a love of right principles and an innate desire and purpose to be fair and just in all the relations of life, are not entitled to very much "respect." The point I want to make, Mr. President, is that this young man, Locke, who sat at that telephone in California, with the water roaring down the valley behind him, when he knew certain death was coming to him, was as great a hero as ever died on the battle field. No higher example of devotion to duty and superb valor and heroism has come to my notice. This young man possessed the highest of human qualities. He gave his life to save the lives of others. He died nobly and heroically serving his fellow man.

Mr. President, if the writers in the periodicals of our day would do more to foster and exalt human virtue rather than to praise brilliant intellects that use their power to spread evil doctrines and wrong principles, the country would be better off.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order. First, the Chair lays before the Senate an Executive communication.

ADMISSION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I introduce a bill proposing an amendment to the immigration law, together with a brief explanation of the purpose of the amendment, and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The bill (S. 3657) to amend the immigration act of 1924, as amended, in respect of nonquota immigrants, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Immigration, and, with the accompanying statement, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (a) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) An immigrant who is the unmarried child under 18 years of age, the father, the mother, or the wife, of a citizen of the United States who resides therein at the time of the filing of a petition under section 9."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This is an amendment to the immigration act of 1924, which proposes to admit in excess of the quota the parents of American citizens.

As the law now reads, parents of American citizens are given only a preference within the quota, which in most countries has been exhausted for many years to come. This amendment would give to parents of American citizens nonquota status and allow them to enter the country without years of waiting. It is purely a humane measure.

AMENDMENTS TO FLOOD CONTROL BILL

Mr. McKELLAR submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 3434, the flood control bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Ordered, That the papers filed in support of S. 1091, Sixty-seventh Congress, for the relief of Hannah Nelson Lundgreen, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

SALES OF FOREIGN MANUFACTURED LEATHER

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over without prejudice.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, March 16, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Jehovah Father, Thou art wisdom, Thou art love! Remember us, O Mighty One. Our hearts tremble at this petition. We would hide our souls from the dread vision of Thy holiness. Have mercy upon us; remove our transgressions from us as far as the east is from the west. With every rising sun enable us to cancel the regrets of our yesterdays and concern ourselves with our to-days, and go forward to attain. Our deepest desire is that our thoughts, words, and deeds may stand the scrutiny of the broad day and sound true in every test. Holy Spirit, be with us and guide us, that our lives may be as honest in the dark as they are in the light; as good in obscurity as they are in publicity; as faithful when alone as when all the world is looking on. May we set our affections upon the dateless and the spaceless things of Thy kingdom. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

H. R. 4964. An act to authorize the city of Muskogee, Okla., to remove and retain title to the boilers from the Municipal Hospital Building recently conveyed by the city to the United States Veterans' Bureau No. 90, at Muskogee, Okla.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2800) entitled "An act authorizing E. K. Morse, his successors and assigns (or his or their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns), to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River at or near Burlington, N. J."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. JONES and Mr. FLETCHER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Commerce.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE VERMONT FLOOD

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks of my own in regard to the Vermont flood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in regard to the Vermont flood. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, we have heard on this floor more than one vivid portrayal of the Mississippi flood. These have aroused the interest and excited the sympathy of the entire Nation. I will tell you in brief the story of our disastrous flood of 1927. You will see that lives were lost, suffering was endured that left a record quite as grim as that in the valley of the great river that draws its waters from so many of our States.

Vermont is a comparatively small State. Its area is only 9,564 square miles. The last census recorded a population of 352,428 people scattered along the valleys and on the rugged hills that overlook them. Our property listed for taxation in 1926 was $317,000,000, while the total estimated wealth stated in the last census report was $842,040,000.

The autumn of 1927 was one of marvelous beauty. The weather was perfect and the verdure fresh beyond the normal period. Crops came into complete maturity. Barns and granaries were full and Vermonters looked ahead to the rigors of coming winter months with a sense of security and contentment.

Over our roads, winding here and there among the hills, passed thousands of tourists contemplating with amazement scenes of rare beauty in this Switzerland of America. Henry Ford, in referring to Vermont, recently said:

> Tell we where, in this great country, is there a spot so beautiful as Vermont. The summer can not be duplicated in the world. Show me the tourist that visits the Green Mountain State, and I will show you the tourist who will continue to go to Vermont always.

In addition to the hundreds of miles of gravel-surfaced roads we had entered upon an ambitious project of building hard-surfaced roads. Nearly 50 miles were completed last year. We have already expended nearly $8,000,000 of Federal and State money on this program, building 65.1 miles of concrete, 51.4 miles of bituminous macadam, 109 miles of gravel, and 54 bridges of over 20-foot span. We have been building for what seemed to be a bright and prosperous future.

During the evening of November 2 a warm rain commenced that soon extended itself into a downpour. Lawns, gardens, and fields soon became water-soaked; pools formed in all hollows; hour after hour the rain came until in some sections 40 hours passed before there was any let-up, with a precipitation of over 8 inches of water. Small brooks became raging torrents, reaching out and sweeping everything within reach of the waters. The main streams became full, overflowed, came into the streets of prosperous valley towns, up to the front steps of the homes and business places, then into them, driving occupants out or into the second stories; the mad waters pounded down their courses against dams and narrow passes like demons bent on destruction of everything within reach. Bridges were carried away, 1,258 of them; trees torn up by their roots; houses demolished; whole sections of villages disappearing; acres of land washed away and farms ruined; herds of valuable cattle drowned; houses, with all occupants, swallowed up. House after house, with all equipment—stoves, furnaces, furniture—go down White River in a wild, raging torrent that rises, at Gaysville, not 10 or 20 feet but a hundred feet, and not a brick or a splinter has ever been found. Great gullies suddenly appeared, in some cases a hundred feet deep, even where there had been no stream. Railroads that carried over 65 per cent of the milk supply for the city of Boston were put out of commission overnight and left twisted masses of iron and wood, with no semblance of roadbeds. As a result, the Central Vermont Railway, which traverses the State, is in the hands of a receiver. Normal traffic conditions can not be resumed for months. About 60 people were drowned, including Hon. S. Hollister Jackson, lieutenant governor, as fine a type of citizen and public official as ever served a State.

A vivid pen picture of the rushing, rising flood of waters and the heroic endeavors of the people to battle them is drawn by the Hon. Luther B. Johnson, editor of the Randolph (Vt.) Herald, in the following words:

> In the face of the overpowering waters, beating ceaselessly for passage, and constantly rising, inch by inch, a foot or more an hour, before one's eyes, man's puny opposition was futile. Yet how men strove to save and protect! With shovels, axes, trees, timbers, loads of stone, sandbags, and everything that would serve as an impediment, they fought the streams—fought hard and long, long into the blackness of night, but seldom with avail. The watery monster was for once their master.
>
> What happened during that horrorful night the succeeding pages tell only in part. Mostly it went on unseen. The ravaging flood here and there claimed its single victim or its entire family without the then knowledge of others. Here and there isolated groups or individuals were taken from their fated homes at imminent peril in Stygian darkness or by the fitful gleam of lantern or flash light. During that night prodigies of valor were performed. Sometimes these deeds saved those beleaguered; sometimes, though just as valorous, they failed.
>
> Unchecked longer by human effort, the flood itself ran its course, seemingly swollen by pride in its achievements, and roaring loudly to proclaim its triumph. Instead of small driftwood, it now bore at racing speed dwellings, barns, sometimes shattered, sometimes whole, with lights still burning, and in them hastening to death were occasionally fathers, mothers, children, horses, cattle, livestock of all kinds. It bore also bridges, huge and small, torn from their foundations; dams wrenched from their firm beds; even immense rocks and heavy machinery rolled and tumbled along. It invaded whole towns and cities, filling shops and stores, driving people to second floors and attics. It ruined hopelessly large stocks of merchandise and the treasured, hard-earned furnishings of homes, both rich and humble. It carried out scores of railroad bridges built of iron, cement, and stone; washed down great embankments and left the tracks suspended for long distances in air, sometimes on edge, sometimes turned over. In a few places new chasms yawned during that night and engulfed almost entire villages.
> With dawn on Friday, November 4, the drenching rain continuing, but somewhat abated in violence, came a scene never to be forgotten and to be recalled with a shudder. All that the imagination of the awful night had pictured was more than realized. A single 12 hours had completely changed the landscape, and in many places the geography, of practically all the river and brook courses of Vermont. Streams ran where they had never run before since the coming of the white man. Their old beds lay stone strewn and hollow. Whole meadows of fine land were gone, acres of rich soil eaten away in the night, and the still hungry waters crumbling them back further, foot by foot. Habitations and buildings and living beings were gone. Bridge abutments stood mutely mourning their uselessness. All the destruction of the night and previous afternoon was revealed with the coming of another day. Yet not all—more was to be revealed when the waters subsided.

The experience of Montpelier, the State capital, is typical. After hours of downpour, water began to come into the streets about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. Four hours later it had become a raging flood 10 to 12 feet deep, running with such force that an automobile, caught in its course and striking a tree, would be wrapped about it like a piece of paper. Every window in the business houses on the street levels was broken, whole stocks of goods and fixtures were swept out and lost, with the result that every business place where merchandise was sold was compelled to close. Then the waters rushed on down the Winooski spreading ruin, death, and destruction everywhere within the confines of the valley. In many places landscapes were completely changed; what were once villages with houses and streets became areas of barren, jagged rocks or yawning chasms.

What of the damage? A survey was made under the direction of the governor. A survey was made by the Bureau of Public Roads under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture. Secretary Herbert Hoover, of the Department of Commerce, visited the stricken area by direction of the President and estimated the loss. Out of these examinations we have been able to arrive at a fairly accurate estimate of the losses sustained.

ROAD AND BRIDGE DAMAGE

The State highway department has estimated the road and bridge damage as follows:

Federal-aid system	$2,653,733
State-aid system	2,954,052
Unselected highways	1,866,012
Total	7,062,998

The Bureau of Public Roads after a careful survey estimated the road and bridge damages as follows:

Federal-aid system	$2,502,133
State-aid system	3,105,652
Unselected highways	1,769,684
Total	7,377,469

It will be seen by these estimates that the Bureau of Public Roads places the total damage $314,471 more than the estimate made by the State officials.

The State road mileage is divided as follows:

	Miles
Federal-aid roads	1,043
State aid other than Federal aid	3,322
Unselected highways	10,705
Total	15,070

We have 1 mile of highway to every 23 of our population. The damages to highways and bridges alone is equal to a per capita assessment of $21 on every person in the State.

Lives lost	62

The total loss is equal to a per capita loss of $86 for every man, woman, and child in the State. It is equal to one-tenth of all the property in the State assessed for taxation. On the basis of wealth, the Vermont flood disaster would be comparable to a disaster overtaking the District of Columbia and causing a damage of $60,000,000; to a disaster in North Carolina causing a damage of $150,000,000; a disaster in Arkansas causing a damage of $90,000,000; in Massachusetts, causing a damage of $480,000,000; in California, causing a damage of $570,000,000.

The damage to Federal-aided and State-aided highways and bridges in Vermont is nearly twice the amount of damage caused by the recent floods in the whole Mississippi Valley for similar classes of roads.

I have called your attention only to actual damages. When we consider that the indirect business losses will amount to more than $100,000,000 in addition to the direct losses, you get some conception of our great disaster. Where does the history of our Nation record a greater one?

Vermonters find themselves in a novel situation. We do not easily adjust ourselves to it. During an existence of 136 years as a State we have never come to the Federal Government and asked for help. We have given cheerfully of our money and manhood to the service of the Union, that it might be great and strong. Our proud, self-reliant people are loath to ask for assistance now. We are believers in State independence. If all the States would care for losses from disasters, we would bear our burden without complaint. But the present policy of the Federal Government is to step forth and lend a helping hand to any single member of the sisterhood that suffers from a great disaster.

I have introduced a bill (H. R. 9767) which authorizes an appropriation of $2,654,000 for the relief in the matter of roads and bridges damaged, to be expended in accordance with the provisions of the Federal highway act, except that the provision limiting Federal payments to not exceeding $15,000 per mile and the provision restricting expenditure of Federal funds upon roads within municipalities having a population of 2,500 or more shall not apply. The amount named is practically the amount of damage to Federal roads and bridges. The State of Vermont under this act must match the money appropriated by the Federal Government, dollar for dollar. The bill has the approval of the Bureau of Public Roads, the Department of Agriculture, and the Bureau of the Budget.

The bill was submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture for recommendation and report. Under date of March 16, Acting Secretary R. W. Dunlap replied in writing. After reviewing the provisions of the bill, the essential portion of his recommendation is as follows:

> The investigations made by the Bureau of Public Roads in cooperation with the highway department of Vermont as to the damages to roads and bridges in the State occasioned by the recent flood convinces this department that legislation of the kind proposed is very meritorious. The department, therefore, would like to see favorable action on the bill.

The department's letter was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget for its recommendation and bears the following notation of that bureau:

> Submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, pursuant to Circular No. 49 of that bureau, and returned to the Department of Agriculture under date of March 16 with the advice that the legislation proposed in H. R. 9767 would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

It is fortunate that the Bureau of Public Roads in cooperation with the Vermont Highway Department conducted a survey during the summer of 1927 of the transportation on the highways of the State. While most of the work went for naught owing to destruction by the November flood, the report of the survey, but recently printed, afforded valuable information as to the use of Vermont's Federal-aid and State roads by motor vehicles of other States. It appears from this report that 35 per cent of the travel over these roads is by motor vehicles from without the State. The report furnished the Bureau of Public Roads information upon which it could base its recommendations as to what is a reasonable amount for the Federal Government to contribute toward the rehabilitation of Federal-aid roads in Vermont. If 35 per cent of the traffic on our roads is from without the State—the report furnished the Bureau of Public Roads information upon which it could base its recommendations as to what is a reasonable amount for the Federal Government to contribute toward the rehabilitation of Federal-aid roads in Vermont—if 35 per cent of the traffic on our roads is from without the State, the Federal Government has a great interest in their reconstruction.

A hearing has been held by the Committee on Roads of the House. The bill has been reported favorably by a unanimous vote. Owing to the early approach of spring, when work on the roads can be resumed, and the necessity of letting contracts at an early date, it is hoped that early action may be had on the part of the House.

Suffering from one of the greatest calamities that ever befell the people of a State in the history of the Nation, we are undertaking the problem of rehabilitation with courage. We are not faltering. Filled with the same spirit that actuated our forebears when they entered a trackless wilderness and with resolution and courage carved out a State and maintained its independence for years, and we are coming back.

Give us encouragement by granting the help asked for in our great emergency, and in a short time we will welcome you to old Vermont, the first to cast her lot with the original thirteen, welcome you with genuine hospitality to a land of beauty, with winding roads over hills and through valleys, to a State of as brave men as ever answered the call of service and of as fair women as ever graced the family fireside.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 9767, introduced by my colleague, Mr. GIBSON, and reported favorably by the Committee on Roads, authorizes an appropriation of $2,654,000 for the relief of Vermont in the matter of highways damaged by flood. It is my purpose to outline briefly the reasons why representatives of Vermont are asking for this appropriation.

The newspapers have carried such a complete story of the flood which descended upon Vermont in November, 1927, that you are probably already somewhat familiar with the destruction of property which it caused and the toll of human life which it levied. The people of Vermont are now face to face with the difficult problem of rehabilitation.

The legislative reference service of the Library of Congress has compiled a list of the acts passed by the Congress for the relief of those who have suffered from calamities of various kinds. These acts go back to 1803 and revised to date would include the following item in the deficiency bill passed in the opening days of this session of Congress:

Emergency flood control, Mississippi River: For reimbursement of the appropriation for "flood control, Mississippi River," and the appropriation for "Maintenance and improvement of existing river and harbor works," for amounts expended therefrom for emergency work on the lower Mississippi River on account of the flood of 1927, $7,000,000.

It would also include the following item in the War Department appropriation bill recently passed:

FLOOD RELIEF

Flood relief, Mississippi River: For the reimbursement of funds contributed by local interests to the Mississippi River Commission, and used for emergency levee construction and repair work on the lower Mississippi River on account of the flood of 1927, $1,500,000, to be immediately available and to be expended by the Mississippi River Commission: Provided, That the provisions of the flood control act approved March 1, 1917, in so far as they forbid expenditures by the Mississippi River Commission for levee work unless local interests contribute one-third the cost thereof, shall not apply to emergency levee work done, or to be done, on account of the flood of 1927.

If you will go through this list of acts, going back a century and a quarter, you will find none for the relief of the State of Vermont or of any political subdivision thereof. I believe that this is the first time that representatives of Vermont in the 136 years of its membership in the Union have appeared before a committee of Congress asking for relief. Such calamities as we have had heretofore have been within the capacity of our self-reliant people to meet. I assure you that we appear here now only because a disaster has befallen our State so overwhelming that it is without parallel in her history.

We are accustomed these days to think of things in terms of size. Because of this the attention of the Nation is, and has been for months, centered upon the flood disaster in the valley of the Mississippi. I wish in no way to minimize the terrible disaster which has overtaken our people in the Mississippi Valley. Figures as well as pictures tell a story of appalling destruction there. Nor do I question their dire need of assistance nor the wisdom of an emergency measure which carried with it the expenditure of $7,000,000 in their behalf, but it does give me confidence to bring our needs to your attention, and it does give me the hope that in proportion as our needs equal theirs we may look for like assistance. Let us, then, in order to grasp the extent of the Vermont flood disaster, compare for a moment the damage done to our little State with the damage done to the several States which suffered from the Mississippi flood. This comparison should, I think, be made in terms of relative population and wealth, so the problems presented to the people and the government of each of the several afflicted States may by comparison be made more clear.

In making this comparison for the States of Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, which suffered from the Mississippi flood I have used the estimates of the damage done as given in a pamphlet entitled, "Losses and Damages Resulting from the Flood of 1927," published by the Mississippi River Flood Association. For damage done by the flood in Vermont I have used the latest revised estimates furnished by the Governor of Vermont. It is only fair to the State of Kentucky for me to say that that State suffered damages from another flood occurring at a later time, which does not appear in this record.

The following table shows the relative population, area, and total flood damage done to the Mississippi Valley States and to Vermont and translates these losses in terms of their meaning to the persons involved and their ability to meet them:

State	Population, 1920	Area in square miles	Flood damage, 1927	Wealth in thousands, 1922	Per capita flood damage	Flood damage per million dollars of State wealth
Arkansas	1,752,204	53,335	$37,948,919	$2,599,617	$21.66	$14,600
Illinois	6,485,280	56,665	16,765,465	22,232,794	2.59	750
Kentucky	2,416,630	40,598	3,295,750	3,582,391	1.37	674
Louisiana	1,798,509	48,506	38,389,814	3,416,860	21.35	11,240
Mississippi	1,790,618	46,865	45,931,294	2,177,690	25.65	21,090
Missouri	3,404,055	69,420	7,691,265	9,981,409	2.26	770
Tennessee	2,416,630	42,022	5,958,950	4,228,251	2.47	1,410
Vermont	352,428	9,564	30,435,299	842,040	86.35	36,146

You will see from this comparison that only the three lower Mississippi Valley States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana suffered a total flood damage exceeding that of Vermont. You will see also that the damage per person in Vermont was more than three times the damage per person in the average of the Mississippi States worst afflicted, and the damage per million dollars of State wealth, which means capacity to meet loss, in Vermont is more than twice that suffered by Arkansas, more than three times that suffered by Louisiana, and is more than one-half greater than that suffered by the State of Mississippi—the three States sustaining the greatest flood damage in the Mississippi Valley.

This, I think, will make clear to the membership of the House what a flood loss of $30,435,299, visited upon a small rural State with a small population, means to the people of that State, and will explain why we, as representatives of that State, are here asking you to pass a bill which will grant help from the Federal Government to our people in meeting a difficult problem.

RELIEF LIMITED TO PUBLIC WORKS

Our request for relief is limited to the rehabilitation of public works—namely, roads. Our losses to private property have borne heavily upon farmers, business men, and corporations. One of our main railroad lines is in the hands of a receiver and will probably not resume normal operations for months to come. Other lines have spent millions to repair damages. Many farmers and business men have lost their savings of a lifetime and are being assisted to carry on by the Red Cross, by private gifts, by loans from the Vermont flood corporation, from banks, and from various other sources. We are asking for no appropriation to help our people meet losses of this kind. You can readily see, however, that the tax-paying ability of our people is greatly impaired, and it is extremely difficult for a small State to meet the tremendous burden imposed and, for years to come, next to impossible for it unassisted to carry on its normal activities.

Vermont is, as you know, a mountainous State. Its river valleys as they cut across or run parallel to the mountain ranges are for the most part narrow and hemmed in by hills on either side. The main roads are located in these valleys and received the full force of the rushing water, which could be likened in its fury but to a storm at sea. When the flood waters receded Vermont found herself practically without a road system in large areas of the State. Roads and bridges which it had taken a century to construct were destroyed in one short day. Photographs well illustrate this.

As soon as the extent of the damage was known the State highway department laid plans for making temporary repairs in order to make it possible to deliver the mails and to transport food and supplies to the towns and cities which were cut off from rail transportation. The cooperation of local town officials in this work was splendid. I heard an Army engineer pay tribute to the resourcefulness of Vermont town officials who in a remarkably short space of time threw temporary bridges of logs and plank across rivers and smaller streams and filled great gullies in roads so that traffic could get through. I am informed that the temporary road repairs alone will cost nearly $1,000,000.

Then came the problem of permanent reconstruction. The Federal Bureau of Public Roads very generously came to our assistance and detailed a force of engineers to make estimates of the cost of reconstruction. Our roads in Vermont are divided into three classes—Federal-aid, State-aid, and town roads. The Bureau of Public Roads has made the following report as to the damage done by the flood to roads and bridges in Vermont. I have inserted the mileage of roads of each class:

	Miles	Damages from flood		Total
		Roads	Bridges
Federal-aid system	1,043	$983,213	$1,670,520	$2,653,733
State-aid system	3,419	690,930	2,263,122	2,954,052
Town roads	10,408	399,288	1,370,396	1,769,684
Total	14,870	2,073,431	5,304,038	7,377,469

The State has always cooperated with the towns on the Federal-aid and State-aid systems, but only in a very minor way on the town roads. The burden thrown upon many of the river towns, however, would have bankrupted these towns had they been obliged to bear the burden of restoring the road system. Therefore the governor called the legislature into special session, and an act was passed to authorize the State to assume the burden of restoring the highways by a bond issue for this purpose.

Now, I can perhaps illustrate to the committee the extent of the burden which has been placed upon the State of Vermont to meet this task of restoring its highway system by again making a comparison with the Mississippi Valley States. The following table will show the relative total damage to highways and bridges, the highway damage per person, per mile of road, and the total per capita tax as prepared by the Census Bureau for 1922:

State	Flood damages to highways and bridges, 1927	Flood damages to highways and bridges per person, 1927	Damages to highways and bridges per mile of road	Total per capita tax (State)
Arkansas	$1,268,715	$0.72	$17.64	$13.87
Illinois	38,000	.006	.39	40.76
Kentucky	5,000	.002	.09	19.40
Louisiana	550,000	.306	13.75	29.20
Mississippi	400,000	.223	7.55	20.99
Missouri	376,407	.111	3.38	29.01
Tennessee	100,000	.04	1.53	18.46
Vermont	7,377,469	20.93	495.14	34.29

The highway losses for the Mississippi Valley States are taken from the estimates of the Mississippi River Flood Control Association and for Vermont from the estimates of the Federal Bureau of Public Roads. The highway losses from the June flood in Kentucky are not included.

You will see that in highway losses suffered from the flood Vermont stands in a class by herself. You will see also from the rate of taxation already paid how difficult it will be for Vermont to repair the damage caused by the flood and at the same time keep up the new construction which the demands of increasing traffic made upon our highway system.

VERMONT'S HIGHWAY PROBLEM

The highway problem in Vermont has been the subject of a recent cooperative study by the United States Bureau of Public Roads and the Vermont Highway Department. This bureau in conjunction with the State highway department made a survey of traffic on the Vermont highways in 1926. Upon this survey and upon predictions as to future needs, recommendations were made in a report recently released as to what Vermont should do in the way of future road construction. Up to 1923 roads constructed in Vermont were principally of gravel surfaces. They were not in all cases the best roads but they were such as we could pay for. It became apparent, however, that on our main routes, including the Federal-aid designated system and some of the State roads a surface superior to gravel was necessary because traffic had increased to the point where the cost of maintenance of gravel surfaces made the construction of a surface superior to gravel necessary. The report recommends a construction program for the years 1927–1931 of 275 miles of surface superior to gravel on the principal routes, which are Federal-aid routes, at an estimated cost of $12,000,000. Then in continuation of this program it recommends for the years 1931–1936 the construction of 278 miles additional, all except 80 miles on the Federal-aid routes, with a probable cost of another $12,000,000. The regular annual Federal-aid allotment for Vermont is $365,000. This 10-year program would cost a total of $24,000,000. This program of construction was entered upon by the Vermont Legislature of 1927, and during the last year 47.2 miles of hard-surface roads have been constructed at a cost of $1,877,247.

Now, this survey also shows that Vermont roads—and I presume this is true of the roads of all the States—have taken on an interstate and international character. It showed that on our Federal-aid routes and on nearly 1,000 miles of our State-aid system about 35.6 per cent of total passenger-car traffic and 9.6 per cent of the truck traffic was foreign traffic. For instance, the survey showed that of the total traffic on United States numbered route 7, which runs along the western border of Vermont from Massachusetts to Canada, 43.3 per cent was foreign passenger-car traffic. On United States route 5, on the eastern border of Vermont, 46.7 per cent was foreign traffic. The international character of these highways is shown by the fact that of the 815,370 cars which reported in the Vermont customs district in 1927, only 377,892 were Vermont cars. United States routes No. 2 and No. 4 are main through routes between New York and New Hampshire, and their traffic is made up of 34.3 per cent and 37 per cent, respectively, of foreign traffic.

The burden thrown upon Vermont roads by this foreign traffic is indicated by this paragraph from the report:

> The large volume of foreign traffic on Vermont highways adds considerable to the cost of providing highway service on the main routes of travel. This volume of foreign traffic, in addition to local Vermont traffic, results in increased maintenance costs on present improvements, which are loaded beyond their economic capacity, and makes necessary earlier improvement or reconstruction of these routes by the construction of surfaces superior to gravel. The present contribution of foreign traffic to Vermont highways revenue is limited very largely to that derived from the taxation of gasoline sold to operators of foreign cars, and it is doubtful if this revenue is at all commensurate with the increased cost of providing highway service caused by foreign traffic.

Now, Vermont wants to keep her place with her sister States in the line of progress. She wants to provide roads for foreign traffic as well as for her own people, and her policies were being formulated to that end before the recent disaster overtook her.

Vermont is a dairy State, marketing her products in the form of milk and cream. According to a recent survey, made by the United States Department of Agriculture, Boston depends upon Vermont for 62 per cent of her milk and 50 per cent of her cream supply. Other New England cities and New York also obtain from our dairies substantial quantities. These products are perishable and must move from farm to market every day. Unless our roads are restored these cities will obtain with difficulty an essential food supply and the main business of our State will be disrupted.

From the figures presented as to cost of rehabilitating our highway system, you will see that the State of Vermont will have to pay more than seven and three-fourths millions of dollars for permanent reconstruction, in addition to nearly a million dollars already spent for temporary construction. This is more than a small State like ours can bear and expect to do anything in the way of new construction. Therefore we are asking the Federal Government in this bill to assume the cost of reconstructing that part of our highways known as the Federal-aid system.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Idaho, BURTON L. FRENCH, chairman of the subcommittee on the naval affairs appropriation bill, may address the House for 20 minutes immediately after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that we had reached an agreement with those on that side that the gentleman from Idaho was to have 20 minutes of the time that is allotted to the Members against the bill on that side.

Mr. MADDEN. But he is not against the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The minority against the bill wants information which the gentleman from Idaho can give us.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is fair to yield the time that is allotted to those against the bill to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], when he knows that our friend from Idaho is for the bill? There ought to be an equal division of time on such an important measure as this $274,000,000 bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But there is no agreement in the House that that can be done. I understand there is no request approved by the House that that be done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is important to have information not only as to the cost of building these ships but also as to the cost of maintaining them, and as part of the opposition I am very anxious that the House should have that information.

Mr. BLANTON. But there is a question of policy that is more important even than the $274,000,000 cost of these ships. It is the question of the policy of the Government as to whether it is going to be peaceful or militaristic. But there has been no such request such as that proposed made to the House, so, of course, there is nothing before the House.

EXTENDING TIME OF GENERAL DEBATE ON BILL FOR NAVAL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to speak for a minute or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know what gentlemen will say except one gentleman whom I esteem, and who has 15 minutes accorded him. He is opposed to this bill on principle. I do not know the views of other gentlemen who wish to speak; but how in the world we are to accommodate the Members of this House who desire to speak on this great public measure I do not know.

I want to say this: I introduced the rule fixing the time at not less than 10 hours. In my absence at home trying to get rid of a physical ailment that bothered me a lot my committee saw fit to reduce it to six hours, and here I am with this long list of Members of this House who are entitled to be heard on this public measure and who wish to be heard.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent that the time be extended four additional hours?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman was present when the time in the rule which I introduced was reduced, so I suggest that he fix it right. I am not responsible.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman knows that two hours have been added to the time, making eight hours altogether.

Mr. BUTLER. I talked with almost 100 Members of the House before I asked for 10 hours originally and, therefore, I was supposed to know something about it. Here are gentlemen in front of me now who desire to say something concerning this bill. I do not know what the gentlemen will say, but they are Members of the House and are entitled to be heard. It is getting to be commonly understood that public debate in this House is no longer tolerated. When I introduced this rule, I did it for the purpose of affording all gentlemen an opportunity to express themselves upon this bill, one way or the other, and I repeat that during my absence the committee to which I belong and whose membership I greatly care for saw fit to reduce the time to six hours. Now, they can fix it up the best way they know how.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will state to the gentleman that when we appeared before the Rules Committee we thought that probably six hours would be enough. Yesterday two additional hours were given. As the chairman has requests for speeches to be made both for and against the bill, I might suggest that under the five-minute rule there will be ample opportunity accorded every Member of the House who desires to discuss the bill pro or con. Why does the gentleman care to prolong general debate when ample opportunity will be given under the five-minute rule to debate the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. My friend, this is the last time I shall ever endeavor to divide two hours' time among 40 or 50 speech makers. My friend may do it the next time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am simply making this suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is able to do many things, and the gentleman may be able to make this division of time to the satisfaction of these gentlemen.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why does not the gentleman ask for two more hours of general debate?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that time for general debate on this bill may be extended one hour, with the express purpose of accommodating the gentlemen who desire to speak upon this measure, this time to be divided according to the way the time has already been divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the naval bill be extended one hour, one-half to be used by those in favor and one-half by those opposed to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed for just 10 seconds. Some gentlemen say this will carry us into to-morrow. We are paid to be here to-morrow and it is a working day. Other gentlemen complained to me they were kept here all yesterday afternoon waiting to speak; they were paid to be here. Some complain because the Secretary of the Navy occupied a seat, when we, all of us who were here, know he could have had 250 seats in this Chamber if he had desired them.

Mr. BLANTON. I doubt that, unless the people had said so. The people fill these seats here.

Mr. BUTLER. And I remember the time when the gentleman's party was in control of the House here and members of the Cabinet occupied seats on the floor and we welcomed them here.

Mr. BLANTON. But they did not come here and interfere with a bill in which they themselves were interested.

Mr. BUTLER. And there was no such interference here yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

STONE MOUNTAIN MONUMENT

The SPEAKER. By authority of Senate Concurrent Resolution 12, which passed the House yesterday afternoon, the Chair desires to announce the appointment of the following committee:

Mr. THOMAS M. BELL, Georgia; Mr. JOHN Q. TILSON, Connecticut; Mr. LOUIS T. MCFADDEN, Pennsylvania; Mr. C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER, Iowa; Mr. JOHN M. ROBSION, Kentucky; Mr. CHARLES L. FAUST, Missouri; Mr. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, Virginia; Mr. CLARENCE F. LEA, California; Mr. JOHN J. O'CONNOR, New York; and Mr. WILLIAM W. ARNOLD, Illinois.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I supplement that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval construction bill, with Mr. BACON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair kindly inform me of the amount of time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Oklahoma has 58 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Georgia has 53 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Pennsylvania has 60 minutes remaining against the bill and 56 minutes remaining in favor of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Does that include the extra hour?

The CHAIRMAN. That includes the additional hour.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, of that one hour I desire to yield 10 minutes of the time to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], and I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr.

VINSON] will also yield to the gentleman 10 minutes, so that the gentleman may have 20 minutes' time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Idaho 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The agreement was that the time allotted to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] was to be used by those against this bill. The gentleman is not able to grant those of us who are against the bill the full time we would like to have, and it is well known that the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] is for the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am yielding the 10 minutes, I will say to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, in considering a bill of the magnitude of the shipbuilding authorization bill now pending (H. R. 11526), there is one most important factor that ought to be in the minds of all Members, because it is a factor that will continue to carry on throughout the years following the enactment of whatever measure may be adopted providing for the increase of the Navy.

I refer to the element of cost. In this connection the Congress and the country should have in mind the true perspective that can be had only by fitting the proposed program into the existing Naval Establishment and considering beyond this, as best we may, additional building programs that the near future will demand and the cost of maintaining such programs. When I speak of the cost of maintaining such programs I do not have in mind alone the cost of building of ships. I have in mind the cost of shore stations, the cost of upkeep, the cost of officers and men, the cost, in fact, that the Naval Establishment as such must be to our Nation throughout the years to come.

At this point I shall insert in my remarks the table that is before you showing in an approximate way the Navy of the United States translated into dollars and extending over the period of years over which construction will progress under the pending bill:

	1929	1930	1931	1932	1933	1934	1935

[1] Not authorized.
[2] $2,900,000 not authorized but necessary for submarine increase in cost.
[3] Unknown possible future building costs.
[4] Unknown possible future operating costs.

Total appropriations, 1928, $338,806,477.90.

In interpreting the table bear in mind the following features:

Section A refers to the Naval Establishment as it is to-day, together with existing programs authorized by law or apparently necessary to round out that which now rests upon law.

The item "Maintenance," as carried through from 1929 to 1935, rests upon the maintenance cost for 1929 alone, and must probably be regarded as the minimum maintenance cost for succeeding years for an equivalent establishment, and to which will need to be added additional maintenance costs that new programs will entail.

Section B refers to the pending bill and the allocation of cost of construction as indicated by the committee report upon the bill plus aircraft that will apparently be necessary for the 15 cruisers and the 1 aircraft carrier and plus the amounts necessary for the modernization of the Pennsylvania and the Arizona, for which legislation is pending.

The totals are suggestive of sections A and B and do not include the two great factors on the table, unknown possible future building costs, and unknown possible future operating costs.

At this point may I say that in general the bill will have my support. I am not in accord with every feature included within its bounds; but on the other hand, it represents so generally the policy it seems this country must follow now, that I doubt if any number of men equal to the number of men who shaped the bill could be assembled from the membership of this body who could shape a measure that would better represent the cross section of sentiment on a naval construction program.

As to fixing a limit of time within which the ships may be laid down, I would strike it out were it in my power. Certainly, I would not require that these ships be laid down within the next three years. I believe a wiser and more economical program, if any time limit must be fixed, would be attained were we to say that three ships would be laid down in each of the five succeeding years. Better, still, it would be if we left out the time element entirely and let that question be determined by the administration and by Congress from year to year.

However, on that question I am not going to oppose the committee program which has been adopted after mature deliberation.

In another paragraph, section 2, it is provided that—the Secretary of the Navy is directed to submit annually through the Bureau of the Budget estimates for the construction of the foregoing vessels.

The word "through" ought to be "to," and I understand that an amendment will come from the Committee on Naval Affairs making the change.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is the agreement between myself and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN], who made the suggestion. We think it is a good suggestion.
